EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

1. Introduction

Sweden has long been home to various minorities such as the Roma, Finns, the Jewish community as well as the Sami, an indigenous population. Nevertheless, Sweden has also long viewed itself as an ethnically homogenous country. This has gradually been changing in large part due to various types of immigration since the 1950s. From the 1950s through to the 1970s, there was labour migration to Sweden. From the 1970s onwards, various groups of refugees arrived due to turbulence around the world. In addition to those from EU countries, there are many people in Sweden who were born in other parts of the world. In 2020, the population reached almost 10.4 million. The proportion of foreign-born inhabitants increased from 6.7 % in 1970 to 19.7 % in 2020.¹ Ethnicity is not monitored, but Sweden's detailed statistics provide relevant proxies, such as statistics concerning country of birth.

Racialised ethnic groups are particularly affected by discrimination and exclusion. The persistent Swedish history of racism and discrimination concerning the Roma has received some recognition in recent years.² Persons perceived to be Muslims or from the Middle East are also clearly affected.³ The evident negative effects of racism/race discrimination on Afro-Swedes in the labour market are well-documented.⁴

Sweden considers itself to be a secular country. At the same time, most people still belong to the Lutheran church, which was formerly the state church (up to 2000). Various congregations other than the former state church have become more established in recent years. This has brought to the forefront certain issues concerning discrimination based on religion as well as freedom of religion. This applies in particular to persons presumed to be Muslims. They may actually be Muslims or in the eyes of the discriminator are mistakenly perceived to be Muslims due to markers such as their name, skin colour, country of birth and/or accent.

In recent years, greater visibility has been given to issues concerning equality in relation to disability and sexual orientation. These grounds, as well as sex, ethnicity and religion, were initially addressed in separate laws that in essence created equality silos, reinforcing the development of uneven legal protection of the different grounds.

Sweden's first law against discrimination, adopted in 1970, was a criminal law provision prohibiting discrimination due to race or religion by merchants in the provision of goods and services.⁵ However, it was the later civil laws against discrimination in working life that set the pattern for the equality silos – based on separate laws and enforcement authorities.

⁵ Government bill 1970:87 concerning ratification of ICERD. Initially the law was found in Penal Code 16:8a, which was changed to 16:9 in 1971. At the time the Government determined that ratification did not require the introduction of laws against race discrimination in working life. Penal Code 16:9 was seldom invoked.

The first equality silo was created by the prohibition of sex discrimination in working life that entered into effect in 1980⁶ along with the establishment of the Sex Equality Ombudsman (JämO). In the 1980s, Sweden rejected the expansion of the mandate of the JämO to ethnicity along with a similar ban on ethnic discrimination in working life. Instead, a 1986 law against ethnic discrimination established the Ombudsman against Ethnic Discrimination. In spite of the law's title, the law did not prohibit ethnic discrimination, but simply addressed the combating of ethnic discrimination through consultations and the provision of advice by the Ombudsman.⁷ Due to international criticism, ethnic discrimination in working life was prohibited in 1994 and the Ethnicity Ombudsman was given the power to go to court.⁸ However, proof of specific intent was required, a much higher standard than applied to sex discrimination. It was not until 1999 that three relatively modern laws against discrimination were adopted, concerning the grounds of ethnicity and religion, disability and sexual orientation. In addition, three separate ombudsmen were established for oversight and enforcement in relation to these grounds.

The 1999 laws did not allow for positive treatment or more effective proactive measures, as was the case with sex discrimination. One key step forward was the application of the same shifted burden of proof regardless of the ground. During the 2000s, transposing EU law played a key role as new laws were adopted. Nevertheless, sex discrimination maintained the primary role within the equality silos and the hierarchy concerning protection and enforcement.

To understand Swedish labour law, it is necessary to understand the dominant role of the social partners. Employees and employers are highly organised (approximately 70 % of employees and 95 % of employers). Labour market issues are largely resolved through collective bargaining, while legislation plays a secondary, often fallback role. Due to their powerful role, the social partners were influential in weakening the development of discrimination law concerning working life. Such laws were viewed as an encroachment on their power.

Sweden has a fairly comprehensive welfare state. Social and economic benefits have been formulated only to a limited extent in terms of rights giving rise to legal claims. The enforcement of individual rights, particularly by groups that are generally affected by discrimination, has not been a strong part of Swedish legal culture. Furthermore, the constitutional tradition in regard to fundamental rights has been weak. This is changing, however, due to the increasingly important role played by EU law, the European Convention on Human Rights and the Swedish Constitution.

2. Main legislation

There are constitutional provisions with respect to discrimination in the Swedish Instrument of Government (part of Sweden's Constitution). While not establishing enforceable rights, according to the first chapter, 'public institutions shall combat discrimination' based on an open list of grounds. In contrast, Chapter 2 provides protections that can be asserted by individuals. Article 12 provides protection against laws and regulations that discriminate against a minority due to their ethnic origin, colour, or other similar circumstances, or on account of sexual orientation. Article 13 prohibits laws and regulations that discriminate on the basis of sex. The relationship to EU law is regulated through the Instrument of Government (1:10 and 10:6) and other laws. Furthermore, the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) was incorporated into national law in 1995 and given quasi-constitutional status.

⁶ Act (1979:1118) on equality between women and men in working life.

⁸ Act (1994:134) against ethnic discrimination.

Sweden has also ratified various other human rights instruments.⁹ However, if an international instrument has not been incorporated or transformed into legislation, such instruments are not part of the national hierarchy of laws. Nevertheless, Swedish laws are to be interpreted by the courts in conformity with such international instruments.

By 2008, Sweden's seven civil anti-discrimination laws contained the protections required by EU law, with the exception of those in relation to the ground of age.¹⁰ There were the four single-ground civil laws covering working life and three multi-ground civil laws prohibiting discrimination in other fields such as education. For implementation purposes, Sweden had four anti-discrimination ombudsmen (sex, ethnicity and religion, disability and sexual orientation).

On 1 January 2009, the seven acts were essentially merged, along with their hierarchies of protection, into the Discrimination Act (2008:567). The grounds of age and transgender identity and expression were added. The ombudsmen were merged into the Equality Ombudsman (DO). Various amendments have been adopted since 2009. In 2015, a new form of discrimination concerning disability discrimination - inadequate accessibility - was introduced. While the reasonable accommodation requirements of Directive 2000/78 were already in effect, this change expanded the concept of a lack of reasonable accommodation as disability discrimination beyond employment to other areas of society. In 2016, the Discrimination Act was amended to level up the general active measures so as to cover all grounds. At the same time, certain more specific duties, such as pay gap surveys, still only apply to sex.

There are also certain relevant criminal law provisions. Although prosecutions are rare, Penal Code 16:9 still bans unlawful discrimination by merchants on the grounds of ethnicity, religion, sexual orientation and transgender identity or expression with regard to the provision of goods and services. There is also the 'hate speech' provision in Penal Code 16:8 concerning the same grounds as in 16:9.

The Regulation on anti-discrimination conditions in public contracts (2006:260), requires Sweden's largest Government agencies to include an anti-discrimination condition in their larger public procurement service and building contracts. The purpose is to increase awareness of and compliance with the Discrimination Act.

Generally speaking, Swedish law fulfils the minimum requirements of the Directives 2000/78/EC and 2000/43/EC. Furthermore, regarding religion, sexual orientation, age and disability, domestic law goes beyond the requirements of EU law since the full material scope of Directive 2000/43/EC essentially applies to all grounds. In addition, transgender identity and expression are covered.

3. Main principles and definitions

The relevant EU definitions and prohibitions of direct and indirect discrimination, harassment, sexual harassment and instructions to discriminate are in the Discrimination Act (Chapter 1, Section 4). Victimisation is also prohibited.

⁹ See Annex 2 of this report for a full list.

The law covers discrimination by association (e.g. a spouse or child) as well as wrongful perceptions about the person who is discriminated against (e.g. where the person is wrongly perceived to be a Muslim). This is based on case law and the legislative materials. The additional form of discrimination, inadequate accessibility, expands reasonable accommodation beyond working life to education and other areas of social life.

The ban on direct discrimination is limited by the possibility of justification. The Discrimination Act reduces the ability to justify direct discrimination in comparison with the old acts. Except for age discrimination, there are no longer any examples of justifications in national law that may be too wide to be acceptable according to EU law.

Four relevant cases were decided by the Labour Court in 2020, all of which concerned disability claims. Essentially all four claimants were unsuccessful. In the general court system, three appeal court decisions rejected a claim by pupils with dyslexia that removal of their normal assistance devices during national exams was discrimination. In another appeal court decision, the lower court finding of inadequate accessibility due to the delays in providing accommodations was upheld. The DO lost an appeal court case concerning discrimination by toy store personnel against a Roma family due to insufficient evidence regarding ethnicity. The DO also lost a district court case concerning disability discrimination against a wheelchair user by a bus company. The court held that measures undertaken by the company were sufficient. Three important administrative law cases concerning freedom of religion were decided in 2020. They involved a special procedure that allows for an examination of the legality of local government decisions. These cases involved city council decisions establishing regulations prohibiting prayer by employees during working hours in one city and prohibiting the use of religious clothing in the other two cities. The courts annulled these decisions. The cities lacked the power to make the decisions as they violated the freedom of religion clauses of the Swedish constitution and the European Convention on Human Rights. If implemented, they would have violated the Discrimination Act.¹¹ Finally, the UN CRPD Committee issued an opinion criticising the failure to include a dialogue as part of the analysis of reasonable accommodation in a 2017 Swedish labour court judgment.¹²

4. Material scope

The material scope of the Discrimination Act fulfils the minimum standards established by EU law. It also goes beyond the scope required by EU law since religion, sexual orientation, disability and age are essentially covered in the same way as sex and ethnicity.¹³ The material scope is set through the headings: working life; education; labour market policy activities and employment services not under public contract; starting or running a business and professional recognition; membership of certain organisations; goods, services and housing etc.; health care and social services; social insurance system, unemployment insurance and financial aid for studies; national military service and civilian service; and discriminatory treatment by public employees.

The Discrimination Act applies to all aspects of the employer-employee relationship in both the public and private sectors. However, self-employed people are not covered by the prohibition of discrimination in working life. Self-employed persons can, however, be protected as natural persons, for example in starting or running a business and as regards professional recognition (Chapter 2, Section 10). Professional organisations are prohibited from discriminating against the self-employed as well as the employed (Chapter 2, ¹¹ All of these cases can be found in Section 12.2 of this report.

¹² Concerning the Swedish case dealt with by the UN see: Lappalainen, P. (2018) Country report, Non-discrimination, Sweden, European network of legal experts in gender equality and non-discrimination, p. 141, (Equality Ombudsman v. Södertörn University). The UN decision is described below in Chapter 10 (under current best practice No. 5).

Section 11). Another potentially relevant issue is that the Discrimination Act does not, as a general rule, protect legal persons.

5. Enforcing the law

Victims of discrimination have three basic options. Complaints can be taken to the Equality Ombudsman (DO), a union or an NGO. Due to the loser-pays rule, for most people the option of a private lawyer carries too much economic risk. In Sweden the loser pays the winning party's legal costs, which can be substantially more than any potential discrimination compensation award. The DO takes only a small number of cases to court (three in 2020). If the DO does take a case, the DO assumes the economic risk. Only a small number of the thousands of complaints submitted to the DO are investigated. Of those investigated, the outcome is generally a DO opinion that is not legally binding. If a case is taken on by a union, the union assumes the economic risk. Few cases are taken to court by the unions, but presumably such cases are often settled.

Finally, victims can turn to an NGO, such as a local anti-discrimination bureau. If the case is not settled, on rare occasions, a bureau can take a case to court. Such cases are generally filed as small claims cases, as NGOs cannot afford the economic risk. Sweden is just beginning to develop an NGO tradition where enforcement of laws can be seen not just as a way of helping individuals but also as a form of advocacy. Although this is common for the social partners, enforcement by less powerful NGOs is seen as a foreign idea. At the same time, equality law itself was once a foreign idea. The dyslexia cases mentioned above (and below in Chapter 10 and Section 12.2) are an example of strategic litigation by civil society NGOs.

Many cases are presumably settled. In this regard, the DO has taken an interesting case to the CJEU. A man was removed from a plane, forced to undergo an extensive security check and then denied the opportunity to re-board. The DO determined that these actions were based on the man's ethnicity and filed a lawsuit demanding EUR 950 (SEK 10 000). The opposing party agreed to pay, but without admitting discrimination. Such a payment usually ends a civil law case according to Swedish procedural law. The DO wanted a hearing on the issue of discrimination, asserting that this was minimally required by e.g. the EU directives. The DO lost. After an appeal, the Supreme Court agreed in 2018 to send the following question for a preliminary ruling:

'Must a Member State in a case of infringement of a prohibition laid down in Directive 2000/43/EC, where the victim requests discrimination compensation, always examine whether discrimination has occurred - and, where appropriate issue a finding of discrimination - whether or not the accused has or has not acknowledged that discrimination occurred, if this is requested by the victim, in order for the requirement in Article 15 on effective, proportionate and dissuasive sanctions to be considered fulfilled?'¹⁴

This case will be decided by the CJEU in 2021.¹⁵ If the CJEU agrees with the DO, the results could have far-reaching effects for both Swedish law and EU-law, not just concerning equality law but in various other fields as well.

Discrimination claims regarding working life are dealt with in the Labour Court as the first instance court, assuming that the claimant is represented by a union or the DO. The DO's right to represent a victim is subsidiary to the right of a trade union to represent its members. The procedures are the same for employees in the private and public sectors. However, for some state employees, the complementary route of appealing through administrative procedures may be available. If an individual brings an employment case on their own, the case is first heard by a district court, with the Labour Court functioning as a court of appeal. The Labour Court is a special court, and its decisions are final.

¹⁴ See Supreme Court case Ö 2343-18, 2018-12-18, <https://www.domstol.se/hogsta-domstolen/avgoranden/2019/20073/>.

Cases outside working life are dealt with in the ordinary court system, i.e. the relevant district court with appeals going to the appeal court and possibly the Supreme Court.¹⁶

A shifted burden of proof concerning discrimination is specified in the Discrimination Act. Nevertheless, few discrimination cases are successful, particularly those concerning ethnicity. There are indications that a key problem lies in a more restrictive application of the burden of proof by the Labour Court, applying it as a shared and not shifted burden of proof, as compared to the ordinary courts.¹⁷

The 2009 act, in addition to the possibility of declaring discriminatory contracts void, introduced a new term for the primary sanction: discrimination compensation. Beyond providing compensation to the victim, the courts are also supposed to give particular attention to the aim of prevention. The level of discrimination compensation was therefore expected to be higher in the future as compared to the damages awarded prior to 2009. As the discrimination compensation awards are still relatively low, the sanctions are hardly proportionate, effective and dissuasive.

A recent study examining awards granted by the Labour Court since the 1980s points out that discrimination awards today are about 4.5 % higher than they were in 1980. There has also been a 170 % increase in trial costs since the 1980s. The study concludes that the trends concerning compensation awarded and increasing lawyers' costs and fees, combined with low success rates and the loser-pays rule, 'create a significant deterrent for plaintiffs bringing discrimination claims.'¹⁸

Compared with the ordinary court system, the Labour Court seems to pay much less attention to deterrence. In the future, this may cause confusion, as some employment discrimination cases start in the district courts and can then be appealed to the Labour Court.

Beyond prohibiting discrimination, the Discrimination Act imposes a duty on employers and education providers to undertake equality promotion measures, in particular concerning men and women. Due to questions about the effectiveness of these measures and other issues, a government inquiry was ordered to examine proposals such as stronger sanctions. The inquiry presented its results in 2020.¹⁹

One potential complementary tool in Sweden for increasing the cost risks of discrimination can be found in the Regulation on anti-discrimination conditions in public contracts (2006:260).²⁰ If the conditions contain meaningful sanctions, such as the risk of contract cancellation, such conditions would increase the interest of employers in proactive anti-discrimination measures.²¹ The total value of all public sector contracts in Sweden is over

EUR 56 billion (SEK 600 billion) annually.²² However, so far there has been little follow-up of such clauses, so their current effectiveness is doubtful.

6. Equality bodies

The DO is the key public institution for supervising compliance with the Discrimination Act. The DO's broad mandate includes investigating complaints and the right to take cases to court on behalf of individuals. The DO can also, for example, provide advice and support; engage in educational and opinion-shaping efforts; propose legal and other measures for combating discrimination; and undertake other suitable measures to promote equality. Independent surveys and reports are important parts of this work.

In more recent years, the DO shifted its focus towards issuing oversight decisions that are not legally binding and not subject to appeal. The decisions are intended to provide guidance as to the application of the law. This has also led to a substantial decrease in the number of lawsuits filed. Three lawsuits were filed in 2020. The DO explains:

'The DO's task of exercising supervision concerning compliance with the provisions of the Discrimination Act should not be confused with the DO's possibility of representing individuals in court. The most important function of supervision is preventive and shall, among other things, strengthen the willingness of the supervisory subjects to comply with the law.'²³

7. Key issues

There are three key issues with respect to the lack of efficacy concerning the Swedish discrimination legislation: the approach of the Equality Ombudsman (DO); access to justice more generally; different courts seeming to implement the burden of proof in different ways.

The move by the DO away from enforcement of the law to an emphasis on information, education and non-binding opinions that cannot be appealed is central, particularly given the DO's primary role in access to justice, broad mandate and the economic risks individuals face when bringing litigation. There has been a clear decrease in a focus on investigating complaints and representing individuals.

In the author's opinion, the focus on non-binding opinions seems to evidence a belief that discrimination is largely based on a discriminator's lack of information, and that an opinion from the DO will lead to a change in attitudes and hopefully behaviour. This seems far from the idea that effective enforcement of the law is a more direct means of affecting behaviour as well as underlying attitudes. This also applies to the DO's oversight of active measures where there is a focus on documentation rather than the effects of the measures. The DO has requested stronger sanctions given the law's limits concerning the duty of employers and education providers to undertake active measures, while at the same time refraining from testing the sanctions that are already available.

If potential discriminators are aware that the DO is not using its full powers to generate legal pressure under the Act, and other bodies are not filling the gap, in the author's view, it is hard to understand why those with the power to discriminate will actually change their behaviour. This approach also seems to undermine the law's purpose, which is to promote actual social change. A serious risk of enforcement is needed to achieve that purpose. If it were the case that information about the undesirability of discrimination was sufficient to change behaviour, a law on discrimination would presumably have been unnecessary.

On access to justice more broadly, Sweden's loser-pays rule is a primary hindrance to the ability of bureaux and other NGOs as well as individuals to enforce the law. There is an imbalance in power between the victims of discrimination and those with the power to discriminate. The victims have little experience with the law and risk losing their limited resources, while at the same time, even if successful, the discrimination compensation amounts tend to be very limited. One result is that due to cost risks, the few cases that NGOs take to court are usually filed as small claims cases. At the same time, the cost risks for employers, merchants and Government agencies constitute 'business' expenses, regardless of whether they win or lose.

The final issue is the use of the burden of proof, which seems to vary among the courts. The ordinary court system seems to have one way of implementing the burden, while the approach of the Labour Court seems more restrictive. Different applications of the burden, either as shared or shifted, result in different decisions in two very similar cases concerning religion and discrimination: one case from 2016 in Stockholm District Court²⁴ and a similar case in the Labour Court in 2017.²⁵ Having two relatively different applications of the same rules by different court systems seems unsustainable in the long run.

To sum up, in the author's opinion, it is not the law itself that changes norms, but the implementation of the law through a critical mass of cases. Just as those with the power to discriminate need to be challenged about their actions, those with the power to decide discrimination cases also need to be challenged, so that they can learn to recognise, understand and counteract discrimination. This critical mass should in turn increase the cost risks of discrimination providing an added incentive for those who discriminate to change their behaviour so that fewer people are subjected to discrimination. Although the law needs to provide redress for victims, the long-term goal of the law is that potential victims are not subjected to discrimination in the first place.

INTRODUCTION

The national legal system

The power to enact laws is vested in the Swedish Parliament (Riksdag). Authorities at the regional and local levels have no competence to enact legislation and do not issue local ordinances with direct relevance to the two directives. However, they can undertake actions that promote equality and counteract discrimination within the framework of their mandates.

As the Parliament is ultimate arbitrator of the law, the courts have historically played a lesser, and more deferential role. However, case law is increasingly being given an important role, largely due to the Europeanisation of the Swedish legal system.

In practice, the right to initiate legislation lies predominantly with the Government. Its right to make legislative proposals to Parliament is guaranteed by the Constitution.²⁶ The process starts with a legal inquiry, after which the results are sent out to relevant parties for comments on the proposed legislation. The Government then formulates a bill specifying and explaining the proposed legislation, including reflections on the comments. The Council on Legislation (Lagrådet), composed of justices from the Supreme Court and the Administrative Supreme Court, is then consulted on the constitutionality and consistency of laws. The Council's opinions are not binding. The bill is then submitted to the Parliament. The report from the Parliament's standing committee is debated in the Parliament. If there are political differences, the two sides normally suggest different wordings concerning the proposed legislation. Formally, there is the main proposal in the standing committee and a reservation or reservations by the minority in the committee. The various formulations are put to a vote. The majority side's arguments in the standing committee and the Government bill (if the Government wins the vote) are thus regarded as 'approved' by the Parliament.²⁷ Therefore, these two documents have considerable importance when interpreting the law.

In general, the Discrimination Act is implemented within the general court system (district courts, courts of appeal and the Supreme Court) and/or the Labour Court. Discrimination in all areas except the labour market is in essence dealt with in the general court system. It is a three-instance system, starting with the district court. In civil cases, the court of appeal must permit the appeal, and the same applies to the Supreme Court concerning a further appeal. Sweden also has a three-tier administrative court system, but in general, it has limited relevance to discrimination issues.²⁸

The Labour Court deals with all aspects of the employer-employee relationship. It is a single-instance system in cases where the worker is represented by his or her trade union and the employer has a collective agreement with that union or, in certain cases, where the Equality Ombudsman (DO) represents a claimant in accordance with the Discrimination Act. Otherwise, it is a two-instance system, with the district courts constituting the first instance, with a right of appeal to the Labour Court.

²⁷ Formally, it is only the report of the standing committee that is being debated but, as the Government almost always repeats what is said in the Government bill and most often wins, in practice it is the Government bill that is used as the main interpretation source, as it is much more detailed.

²⁸ Nevertheless, in relation to the administrative courts, see the three cases described in Section 12.2. In two cases, as the courts were able to reach a decision based solely on the freedom of religion, they decided that they did not need to examine the issue of a violation of the Discrimination Act. In the third case, the court determined that the Discrimination Act did not apply.

Collective agreements cover about 90 % of workers on the Swedish labour market and are very important in setting the rules.²⁹ There is no national minimum wage. Generally, work as a civil servant is governed by contracts and collective agreements in largely the same way as in private employment. Certain special rules apply to public employment, especially in the state sector. These mainly concern the recruitment process, where some constitutional rules on objectivity apply.

List of main legislation transposing and implementing the directives

The main legislation transposing and implementing the directives is the Discrimination Act (2008:567).³⁰ It covers seven grounds: sex, ethnicity, religion and belief, sexual orientation, disability, age and transgender identity and expression. It was adopted on 5 June 2008 and came into effect on 1 January 2009.

In addition, the Equality Ombudsman Act (2008:568)³¹ was adopted on 5 June 2008 and came into effect on 1 January 2009. The Act provides a broad mandate to the Ombudsman concerning oversight of the Discrimination Act, including the right to go to court on behalf of individual victims.

The Discrimination Act is comprehensive. It covers all the grounds of the two directives as well as discrimination due to sex and transgender identity and expression. The areas covered by the act are: working life; education; labour market policy activities and employment services not under public contract; starting or running a business and professional recognition; membership of certain organisations; goods, services, housing and meetings or public events; health and medical care and social services; the social insurance system, unemployment insurance and financial aid for studies; national military service and civilian service; and discriminatory treatment by public employees.

The Penal Code has two sections of some relevance. Penal Code 16:9³² (unlawful discrimination) prohibits discrimination due to race, skin colour, national or ethnic origin, religious belief, sexual orientation and transgender identity or expression by merchants concerning the provision of goods and services. It was seldom used before the 2009 act, and is now used even less. However, the crime of unlawful agitation or hate speech under Penal Code 16:8³³ (which covers the same grounds) can still have an important function concerning matters that do not fall under the Discrimination Act.

The Regulation on anti-discrimination conditions in public contracts (2006:260) could become an important complement to the Discrimination Act. Sweden's largest Government agencies must include an anti-discrimination condition in their larger public procurement construction and service contracts. The purpose of the regulation is to increase awareness of and compliance with the Discrimination Act.³⁴

1 GENERAL LEGAL FRAMEWORK

Constitutional provisions on protection against discrimination and the promotion of equality

The Constitution of Sweden consists of four different documents. The 1975 Instrument of Government contains the provisions that are most relevant in this context, particularly Chapter 1 Section 2, Chapter 2 Sections 12-13 and Chapter 12 Section 5. Chapter 2, Section 19 of the Instrument of Government is also important, as it incorporates the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) and its discrimination rules.

Chapter 1, Section 2 of the Instrument of Government contains generally formulated goals concerning equal opportunities and non-discrimination.³⁵ All the grounds of the directives are covered, but as these are only policy goals, they cannot be asserted by individuals.

Chapter 2, Section 12 of the Instrument of Government prohibits laws or other provisions that entail discrimination in relation to those who belong to a minority group due to ethnicity, colour or other similar circumstances or due to sexual orientation. Section 13 prohibits laws or other provisions that entail discrimination due to sex, while at the same time creating an exception for positive action as well as concerning military service. It is not possible to obtain damages based on a violation of these two sections alone. Their importance lies in the fact that laws and other provisions that are discriminatory could be set aside by the courts.

Chapter 12, Section 5 is an instruction to the state to use only objective criteria when hiring employees. The same provision is set out in Section 4 of the Public Employee Act (1974:269). Some state appointments may be appealed to a board, in which case discrimination can be addressed on the basis of these two pieces of legislation. This part of the Instrument of Government has not been applied without Section 4 of the Public Employee Act being applied as well. This rule thus effectively covers only some state employment relations, although it applies to all grounds in the directive.

On questions of direct applicability, the traditional answer in Swedish legal culture has been that the Constitution is generally not directly applicable and for a long time, constitutional arguments were looked at with considerable scepticism. In 1975 a new Instrument of Government was adopted to replace the one from 1809. At the same time, judicial review by the courts was extremely limited in that an act of Parliament could only be set aside if it was clearly unconstitutional. However, this is changing. One reason is membership of the EU and the changes it led to in the Constitution (e.g. Chapter 1, Section 10 and Chapter 10, Section 6). Another important change was the introduction in 1994 of Chapter 2, Section 19, stating that courts should set aside parliamentary acts that violate the ECHR. In addition, there was the constitutional reform in 2010 that removed the requirement that acts of Parliament could be declared unconstitutional only if the act was clearly unconstitutional. Thus far, it is hard to say that the 2010 change has made a major difference.

The protection from discrimination that stems from the Instrument of Government alone is not sufficient for fulfilling the requirements of the directives. This applies to the areas covered as well as the grounds protected.

Nevertheless, at least in principle, aside from Chapter 1, Section 2, these various provisions are directly applicable and can be enforced against the state, although they cannot be directly enforced against private individuals.

³⁵ Instrument of Government (1975). Chapter 1, Section 2(5), sentence 2 states: 'The public institutions shall combat discrimination of persons on grounds of gender, colour, national or ethnic origin, linguistic or religious affiliation, functional disability, sexual orientation, age or other circumstance affecting the individual'.

2 THE DEFINITION OF DISCRIMINATION

2.1 Grounds of unlawful discrimination explicitly covered

The following grounds of discrimination are explicitly prohibited by national law: sex; transgender identity or expression; ethnicity; religion or other belief; disability; sexual orientation; and age.

2.1.1 Definition of the grounds of unlawful discrimination within the directives

a) Racial or ethnic origin

In the 2009 Discrimination Act, the concept of ethnicity is defined as 'national or ethnic origin, skin colour or other similar circumstance' (Chapter 1 Section 5, p. 3). Although, the word 'race' was removed in the 2009 act, according to the legislative preparatory works, the definition of ethnicity in the law is nevertheless supposed to cover the term 'race'. Discrimination due to ethnicity and religion were considered fairly interchangeable until the 1999 Act on measures against discrimination in working life on grounds of ethnicity, religion or other belief (Lag om åtgärder mot etnisk diskriminering i arbetslivet) (1999:130). At the same time, the delineation between discriminatory acts related to ethnicity as opposed to religion (or a combination of both) is often unclear – both for those who discriminate and for those who are the victims.

Case law provides some clarity concerning the concepts of race or ethnic origin. One case involved a landlord charging refugees a higher rent. The trial court, based on a restrictive view of the term 'ethnic origin', determined that refugees were not protected by the prohibition against ethnic discrimination – refugees were not an ethnicity. In 2010, the court of appeal reversed the judgment of the trial court.³⁶ The court held that the term ethnic origin had to be interpreted broadly, given the intent of the act. This meant that refugees fell within the protection of the law, which also meant that the landlord's actions violated the law. Discrimination against refugees, foreigners, immigrants or any other mixed group defined as being 'non-Swedish' in the eyes of the discriminator can generally be regarded as ethnic discrimination. Since the concept of discrimination relates to the ground and not to the person, it is not necessary to determine whether the victim of discrimination actually belongs to a specific ethnic group.

For a number of years Sweden worked towards the elimination of the word 'race' from Swedish law. According to the Government's assessment, neither Directive 2000/43 nor Directive 2000/78 requires the word 'race' to be used. Directive 2000/43 requires effective protection against race discrimination, which, according to the Government, is achieved under the Discrimination Act as currently written. The author of this report agrees that this assessment is correct in that it is likely that the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) would come to the same conclusion. The directives require the establishment of certain minimum standards, but implementation differs according to national traditions and allows for some flexibility. The directives do not necessarily require specific words to be used in achieving those goals. However, in the author's opinion, there are certain policy and implementation risks involved, even if removing the word 'race' would not necessarily violate the directives. Due to a historical denial of race discrimination as a problem in Sweden, policymakers were slow to adopt modern legislation in this regard. Symbolic laws – at best – were adopted to change attitudes rather than behaviour. The removal of the word 'race' may in turn feed into the more general denial of racism as a Swedish problem and thus confuse judges, lawyers and others in implementing the Discrimination Act. As far as terminology related to discrimination is concerned, policymakers tend to be sensitive to the interests of organisations representing discriminated groups. This relates to empowerment. However, there seems to have been little interest in the opinions of those affected by the term 'race', particularly Swedes with an African heritage. Furthermore, since policymakers seemed to believe that the removal of the word race was relevant to effective implementation of the Discrimination Act, this may in turn be a hindrance to the development of actual improvements in the law.

b) Religion and belief

There is no definition of religion in the Discrimination Act itself. However, the legislative preparatory works regarding the current act and the older acts provide some guidance. This ground covers beliefs that emanate from or are connected to religious beliefs. Atheism and agnosticism are related to the existence or non-existence of a God and are thus counted as beliefs sufficiently connected to religion to be protected by the Discrimination Act.

There is no case law where it has been necessary to define religion or belief more deeply. For example, in the 2018 handshake case,³⁷ the Labour Court accepted the refusal to shake hands with persons of the opposite sex as a part of the complainant's religion without a detailed analysis of the religion at hand, referring to the case law of the European Court of Human Rights. This indicates that a deeper analysis of religious practices is not needed. However, that does not mean that such practices must necessarily be accepted by others, since the practice must be weighed against the interests of others, such as employers.

It is also possible that such cases raise the issue of multiple discrimination, for example, discrimination due to religion, ethnicity and/or sex. Although the author of this report does not know of any cases where the issues have been clearly defined, the Government bill for the Discrimination Act points out the complementary and overlapping nature of the grounds of ethnicity and religion:

'What can be perceived as a cultural or traditional behaviour or expression can generally be assumed to fall under the grounds of discrimination ethnic affiliation if it is not considered to be covered by the ground of religion or other belief. Together, the two grounds of discrimination cover a broad area and it can be assumed that in practice that it is of subordinate importance which of the discrimination grounds is referred to in e.g. a negotiation or before a court.'³⁸

Therefore, a court would not necessarily have to delve that deeply into whether the wearing of a headscarf, niqab or burqa is rooted in religion or ethnicity.

There are situations where the question of definition may be important. If the members of a small group, such as the Jehovah's Witnesses, hold a moral conviction (for example, that gambling is a sin), then it is connected to religion, even if most Christians believe otherwise. When protection for a practice is upheld only by a minority within a congregation, the delimitation of religious belief as opposed to individual philosophical and moral choices can be problematic. Nevertheless, it seems that courts will typically accept the claimant's statement that their religious belief is important to him or her in adopting the practice in question.³⁹

c) Disability

According to Chapter 1, Section 5(4), disability means:

'Long-lasting physical, mental or intellectual limitation of a person's functional capacity that as a consequence of an injury or illness that existed at birth, has arisen since then or can be expected to arise.'⁴⁰

The definition is thus stated in general terms, one requirement being that the limitation in functional capacity must be long lasting. For example, a person with a broken arm will not be covered by the law, since the disability is of a temporary nature. There is no threshold of 'severity', nor is there any reference to the ability to engage in 'normal life activities' or 'professional life', for that matter. The latter forms part of the assessment as regards a 'similar situation'. However, until there is clear case law on the point, it will be difficult to define the issues more closely.

The law, as stated in the legislative preparatory works, covers illnesses that can be expected to limit functional capacity in the future, including HIV, cancer and multiple sclerosis (MS).⁴¹ It is notable that Swedish law does not require an impairment that actually hinders the participation of the person concerned in professional life. In Labour Court case 2005 No. 32, a person diagnosed with MS but not suffering any symptoms was awarded damages for disability discrimination. In Labour Court case 2003 No. 42, a person applying for a post as a systems operator at an oil refinery was denied employment with reference to his diabetes. The employer believed him to be a security risk. This was disability discrimination. The diabetes was real, but the employer failed to show that it was a security risk.

No Swedish claimant has, to the author's knowledge, lost a case because his or her disability issues/medical problems were not regarded as a disability. The focus on the perception of the discriminator makes it immaterial whether or not the disability is as severe as the discriminator believes. For further details see Section 2.1.3.a below.

The area of CJEU case law dealing with the interaction between a person's limitation and barriers at the workplace is not a part of the definition above. In Sweden in practice, barriers in the workplace become important when the employee requests reasonable accommodation measures on the part of the employer. In the opinion of the author of this report, the threshold for proving a disability is slightly lower in Sweden when compared with the case law of the CJEU, since no connection needs to be shown to barriers in private life or barriers in professional life. In Swedish case law, the question of whether the claimant actually has a disability is less important than the focus on the perceptions and actions of the discriminator. In Sweden, the social or human rights model applies in that the focus is on disability being caused by the way that society is organised, rather than by a person's limitations. The focus is clearly not on the medical condition of the claimant.

The Swedish definition, although somewhat different, is at least equally as broad as the definition in the decision by the CJEU in joined cases Ring and Skouboe Werge (C-335/11 and C-337/11).⁴² The claimant is normally not worse off, because in practice, the Swedish definition focuses on the discriminator's perception of functional limitations.⁴³

⁴⁰ The Swedish Government's translation of the law into English, translates the term 'varaktig' as permanent. However, that can lead to some confusion, as other translations of varaktig might be 'enduring' or 'lasting'. In this context, the author of this report considers 'long-lasting' to be a more accurate translation than 'permanent'.

⁴² CJEU, Judgment of 11 April 2013, Ring and Skouboe Werge, Joined cases C-335/11 and C-337/11, EU:C:2013:222.

⁴³ Nevertheless, see Section 2.1.3.a below, which indicates that a person can find themselves in a situation where they are not protected from disability discrimination in a limited number of cases due to a mistaken perception by the discriminator.

d) Age

Under Chapter 1, Section 5(6) of the Discrimination Act, age is defined as 'length of life to date'. This definition includes all ages and makes it clear that the young as well as the old are protected. There is no case law on the definition itself. All case law deals either with justifications provided by the discriminator or with whether two persons are in a similar situation. In the author's opinion, Sweden is slowly coming to grips with the issue of age discrimination. This is a complex process, since age discrimination has long been such an accepted part of society in terms of laws, collective agreements and patterns of behaviour. In turn, this is the reason for the broader exceptions allowed by Swedish and EU law. However, one clear change seems to be that age discrimination is no longer a generally accepted defence to assertions of sex or ethnic discrimination. Prior to the adoption of the 2009 Discrimination Act, it was difficult to overcome an employer's assertion that an applicant was rejected because of their age (which was legal), and thus not their sex or ethnicity (which was illegal).

e) Sexual orientation

Under Chapter 1, Section 5(5) of the Discrimination Act, sexual orientation is defined as 'homosexual, bisexual or heterosexual orientation'. In the legislative preparatory works, the Government indicates that the intention is to create a legal protection that covers the whole population, as all individuals in principle belong to one of these three categories.

2.1.2 Multiple discrimination

In Sweden, there is no specific prohibition of multiple discrimination included in the law. However, many cases involve multiple discrimination.

There are two basic types of multiple discrimination/intersectionality cases. One type is exemplified by Labour Court case 2010 No 91.⁴⁴ The employer in this case was held to be liable for both age and sex discrimination. The discrimination was based on the failure to call a 62-year-old woman to a job interview, and the failure to hire her. Two younger, less qualified women were given the jobs. The employer claimed, among other things, that the woman was not suitable for the job, but failed to demonstrate this and thus failed to overcome a presumption of both age discrimination and sex discrimination concerning 1) being called in for an interview (both men and women were interviewed, including an older man, but not the complainant) and age discrimination concerning 2) being given the job. The Labour Court stated that the combination of two types of discrimination committed by the same failure to act was not a reason to increase the level of the discrimination award. It was treated as a single infringement. At the same time, in the author's opinion, it is interesting that the compensation awarded was relatively large, based on the idea that the woman should have been given the job – although this is not so easy to determine, as she was never interviewed for the position. Although the issue was not discussed by the court, the final result seems to have required an intersectionality analysis.

The Equality Ombudsman receives several hundred complaints per year that potentially cover more than one ground. Most of them are of the type where the complaint concerning discriminatory treatment is asserted to involve, or can be seen as referring to, two or more grounds of discrimination.

The other type of multiple discrimination can be exemplified by Labour Court case 2011 No. 13.⁴⁵ The case regarded two different alleged instances of harassment, one involving ethnicity and the other involving sex. The rules on the burden of proof were applied to each of these two offences separately, and one of the two claimants was successful on both claims. The compensation is higher when there are separate offences concerning the same individual, but the fact that one offence concerned ethnicity and the other concerned sex does not seem to have affected the combined level of damages awarded by the Labour Court. The claimant would probably have received the same amount even if both offences had related to the same discrimination ground.

There has been no case where one action/omission has been held to be more severe because it has violated a person both as a woman and as an immigrant or any other combination of grounds. In that sense there is neither legislation nor case law on multiple discrimination in Sweden and no legislation is being planned in this regard.

There is also no case law in which the issue has been directly addressed by the courts. Nevertheless, current case law is being used, by academics among others, as the basis for analysing the role of multiple discrimination and intersectionality.⁴⁶ In the author's opinion, these analyses may lead to improved arguments in the courts in this field, which in turn could lead to pressure to establish case law or relevant legislation. This seems to have been part of the pattern developed in the US and Canada, where the issue of intersectionality was initially brought into focus through critical analyses of case law by academics.

2.1.3 Assumed and associated discrimination

a) Discrimination by assumption

In Sweden, discrimination based on a perception of or an assumption about a person's characteristics is prohibited by national law.

The definition of (direct) discrimination is related to the ground and not to the person. The wording of the prohibition in Chapter 1, Section 4(1) of the Discrimination Act states that it applies 'if this disadvantaging is associated with' (har samband med) 'sex, transgender identity or expression, ethnicity, religion, disability, sexual orientation and age'. Any discrimination that relates to the protected grounds is prohibited. A mistaken assumption regarding a person's religion is clearly associated with the religion ground.

The principles on mistaken assumption can cut both ways in Sweden. A mistaken assumption regarding a behaviour being caused by alcohol intoxication was a valid defence for a restaurant that refused entry to a person with a disability. The personnel had concluded that the individual was drunk, when in fact the relevant behaviour (walking unevenly/slurred speech) was caused by a disability. The appeal court quoted the legislative preparatory works on mistaken assumptions and did its best to apply the same principle both ways. The court basically concluded that there had to be a recognition by the discriminator that there was a disability in order to conclude that disability discrimination had occurred. The focus in Sweden is thus on what the discriminator knows, believes or mistakenly assumes about the claimant's abilities, not the abilities themselves.⁴⁷ At the same time a mistaken assumption concerning a person's disability led to a finding of discrimination in a case where a child was taken into custody due to assumptions relating to disability concerning the parents. Here, the key was the reliance by the municipality on norms concerning the lack of caretaking ability by persons with cognitive disabilities. There was a failure to examine the mother and the father as individuals.⁴⁸

b) Discrimination by association

In Sweden, discrimination based on association with persons with particular characteristics is prohibited in national law. As the definition of (direct) discrimination is related to the ground and not to the person, the prohibition applies. Treating an ethnic Swede unfavourably because he or she has a lot of Muslim friends may be associated with the ground of religion. This applies to disability as well. If a person is treated less favourably because he or she is the primary carer of a child with a disability, this treatment would be regarded as associated with the disability ground. Swedish law is thus in line with the reasoning established in Coleman v. Attridge Law and Steve Law.⁴⁹

2.2 Direct discrimination (Article 2(2)(a))

a) Prohibition and definition of direct discrimination

In Sweden, direct discrimination is prohibited through the Discrimination Act, Chapter 1 Section 4(1), which reads as follows:

'Direct Discrimination: that someone⁵⁰ is disadvantaged by being treated less favourably than someone else is treated, has been treated or would have been treated in a comparable situation, if this disadvantaging is associated with sex, transgender identity or expression, ethnicity, religion or other belief, disability, sexual orientation or age.'

b) Justification for direct discrimination

The ban on direct discrimination is limited by the possibility of justification in terms of the specific exceptions stipulated by the directives. These are discussed in Section 4 of this report.

2.3 Indirect discrimination (Article 2(2)(b))

a) Prohibition and definition of indirect discrimination

In Sweden, indirect discrimination is prohibited under national law. It is defined.

The definition of indirect discrimination in the Discrimination Act in Chapter 1, Section 4(2) reads as follows:

'Indirect Discrimination: whereby someone⁵¹ is disadvantaged by the application of a provision, a criterion or a procedure that appears neutral but that may put people of a certain sex, a certain transgender identity or expression, a certain ethnicity, a certain religion or other belief, a certain disability, a certain sexual orientation or a certain age at a particular disadvantage, unless the provision, criterion or procedure has a legitimate purpose and the means that are used are appropriate and necessary to achieve that purpose.'

⁴⁸ Svea Court of Appeal, case T 5096, Equality Ombudsman v Sigtuna Municipality (11.04.2014).

⁵⁰ If a group has been discriminated against, each person goes to court as an individual or makes an individual complaint with the Equality Ombudsman. It is easy to deal with many such cases together in a single process if many persons have been discriminated against in the same way by the same discriminator. A group of persons cannot be a discriminator. It is only the person (actual or legal) who is legally responsible for the activity that is regarded as a discriminator.

Concerning recent case law there are two important cases. In Labour Court case 2018 No. 42,⁵² a disabled woman was excluded from being eligible to work for a temporary employment agency due to her registration as being 50 % disabled, which meant that she did not fit into the framework of the collective agreement with the union. According to the agreement, only persons who had a different primary occupation were eligible. Here it was interpreted as meaning that the claimant did not have a different primary occupation since she was 50 % disabled. The court ruled that this constituted indirect discrimination.

In Labour Court case 2018 No. 51⁵³ a woman had applied for a job as an interpreter. The recruitment process was terminated when the woman refused to shake hands with a male representative of the company due to religious reasons, but instead held her hand over her heart as a sign of respect. The court determined that the refusal to shake hands was a manifestation of her religion, and that the ECHR provided some protection for such manifestations. The defendant asserted that it had a handshake policy as an issue of neutrality for interpreters. Various facts were relevant. The work involved phone interpreting. Not shaking hands would have been accepted if the issue was fear of germs. The woman stated that she did not shake hands with men or women when she was in mixed company. Since she greeted everyone by holding her hand over her heart when she was in mixed company, the court reasoned that this should not be taken as a negative sign concerning anyone. On those facts the court determined that the company's actions were not appropriate and necessary, thus constituting indirect discrimination, given the particular facts of the case. The key here was the idea of equal treatment.

b) Justification test for indirect discrimination

Guidance as to justifications is given in the legislative preparatory works to both the Discrimination Act and the previous acts. For instance, as regards the 1999 Act prohibiting discrimination in working life due to sexual orientation, the example given of presumed unlawful indirect discrimination is that of a childcare centre requiring prospective employees to have experience of raising biological children of their own. As regards disability, according to the former Disability Ombudsman, for example, requiring a driver's licence can be a form of indirect discrimination. A licence is a necessary requirement for a job as a taxi driver, but does not have to be essential, for example, for a job as a journalist. The Government bill for the Discrimination Act uses language skills as an example when discussing the idea of a legitimate purpose and under what circumstances a criterion can be appropriate and necessary in order to achieve such a purpose.⁵⁴ The basic principle behind these examples is that the courts can accept any aim as legitimate as long as it is convinced that it is of genuine importance.

There are a number of cases relating to indirect discrimination. Section 6.3 of this report contains two examples concerning indirect discrimination due to religion and the application of the burden of proof. While the justification test applied seems compatible with the directives, the problem was in the differing applications of the burden of proof to what were essentially the same patterns of fact.

2.3.1 Statistical evidence

a) Legal framework

In Sweden, there is legislation regulating the collection of personal data.

As an EU member state, the GDPR (General Data Protection Regulation) is applicable as of 26 May 2018, replacing Sweden's Personal Information Act (Personuppgiftslagen) (1998:204), which had contained rules on the right to register personal information in accordance with the previous EU directive. Article 9 of the GDPR dealing with personal data processing and exceptions is of particular relevance to discrimination issues. The prohibition in Article 9(1) relates to special categories of personal data, such as 'data revealing racial or ethnic origin, political opinions, religious or philosophical beliefs, or trade union membership, and the processing of genetic data, biometric data for the purpose of uniquely identifying a natural person, data concerning health or data concerning a natural person's sex life or sexual orientation'. Article 9 also contains a variety of exceptions that should make it possible to nevertheless collect useful data without violating the regulation. However, Sweden applied the previous rules based on an EU directive in an extremely restrictive manner, so it may take some time to determine the boundaries of the GDPR.⁵⁵

In Sweden, statistical evidence may be admitted under national law, concerning any ground, in order to establish indirect discrimination. Sweden's general procedural rules allow the free presentation of any evidence. The primary restriction is that it must be relevant.

There is no special legislation that is intended to provide statistical data for discrimination cases.

Since indirect discrimination often requires a comparison of group impact, statistical evidence is permitted. The use of statistical evidence is not regulated in any special way. As Swedish procedural rules are based on the principle of freedom of evidence, such evidence – like all other evidence – has to be assessed according to the circumstances. In Sweden, statistical evidence is permitted by national law (given the freedom of evidence principle) and has been used in order to establish indirect sex discrimination.⁵⁶

As a general rule, information is not maintained concerning ethnicity, religion, sexual orientation or disability. On the other hand, the sex and the age of individuals are generally known.

For general statistics purposes the tax authorities maintain the population register (folkbokföringsregistret). This register contains information, inter alia, on the place of birth and nationality of a person, as well as the place of birth of their parents and the date of their taking up residence in Sweden. Religion and belief are not registered as such, but church membership may be registered with the tax authorities so that they can provide assistance in collecting church membership fees.⁵⁷ No information on disability or sexual orientation is included in the population register.

⁵⁷ The Swedish State provides assistance to some churches by having the tax authorities assist them by collecting 'church fees'. Today, this is not a church tax as it was prior to the separation between the

The general inquiry into living conditions undertaken by Sweden Statistics includes health information on impaired vision, hearing or mobility and severe mental or psychiatric problems. This information is relevant to the discrimination ground of disability.⁵⁸ Disability is linked to a person's health and is therefore considered to be sensitive information. The views of the courts on statistics can be somewhat unclear, nevertheless there seems to be some basic expectation concerning the production of statistics or at least some statistical analysis.⁵⁹

In November 2012 the Equality Ombudsman, at the request of the Government, reported its observations to the Government concerning the role of statistics in relation to the work against discrimination.⁶⁰ The Ombudsman's report contained various important principles for future work. One was that nobody should be forced to provide sensitive information regarding themselves. Nobody should thus be forced to reveal their sexual orientation, religion etc. and if they do choose to reveal it, anonymity must be granted. A second important principle is that of self-categorisation. A person must be allowed to belong to the ethnicity, religion, sexual orientation etc. that he or she feels part of. There cannot be a state classification. A third principle is that the views of groups who distrust society⁶¹ must be taken into account in such a manner as to build up trust in the research. One approach can be to make sure the research is done by people such groups can trust.

b) Practice

In Sweden, in practice, statistical evidence has been used in some cases and can be used in order to establish indirect discrimination. This assumes that statistical evidence is available and relevant.

However, to the knowledge of the author, there is no case law other than in relation to sex discrimination using statistics concerning groups that are discriminated against. As regards sex discrimination, statistics have first and foremost been used in cases concerning equal pay, but also employment to some extent. The most well-known case involved height

Swedish state and the Swedish church, but an income-related membership fee. If a church wants this assistance, its members must be registered with the tax authority. Currently there are 18 churches that receive this assistance, of which the largest is the former Swedish state church. The list of other churches can be seen at:

⁵⁹ See, for example, Stockholm District Court, judgment 28.01.2013, Equality Ombudsman v If Insurances. The company refused to insure children if the parent received a form of childcare benefit reserved for disabled or long-term sick children. This could not be direct discrimination, as the group of children consisted of sick but not necessarily disabled children. It was not indirect discrimination either, as the Ombudsman had not shown what proportion of children receiving the benefit were disabled; simply asserting that disabled children were typically disadvantaged by the rule that was applied was not enough. It is important to note that the appeal court held that there was direct discrimination based on the idea that it was enough to show that there was a direct connection (samband med) to two different groups of children – those with disabilities and those with illnesses. This was enough to constitute direct discrimination, since an individual analysis had not been made concerning access to insurance. See Svea Appeal Court 08.10.2013 case T 1912-13, at: <http://www.do.se/lag-och-ratt/diskrimineringsarenanden/if-skadeforsakring-ab/>.

⁶¹ Representatives of some groups, including the Roma, are worried that research may be used to stigmatise the group further. For historical reasons, even in the recent past, these groups have been highly suspicious of the uses that such statistics can or will be put to. There are big differences regarding the level of trust between the groups and the authorities, which may be relevant. See Equality Ombudsman (2012), Statistikens roll i arbetet mot diskriminering (The role of statistics in the work against discrimination), p. 93ff. Trust is at the centre of the Equality Ombudsman's preliminary report.

requirements imposed by a car manufacturer.⁶² Even in these cases, there was no real legal dispute regarding the use of statistics as such. Statistical data related to other grounds are generally not available, so it would be hard to say whether there is a reluctance to use them. At the same time, as the courts have issued judgments finding indirect discrimination on other grounds, the lack of precise statistics was apparently not a hindrance in those cases.

2.4 Harassment (Article 2(3))

a) Prohibition and definition of harassment

In Sweden, harassment is prohibited by national law. It is defined.

In Sweden, harassment explicitly constitutes a form of discrimination.

It is one of the six forms of discrimination enumerated in the Discrimination Act. Chapter 1, Section 4(4) reads as follows:

*'Harassment:*⁶³ conduct that violates a person's⁶⁴ dignity and that is associated with one of the grounds of discrimination, a certain sex, transgender identity or expression, a certain ethnicity, a certain religion or other belief, a certain disability, a certain sexual orientation or a certain age.'

When the 2009 act was adopted, there was some discussion in the legislative preparatory works on whether the definition fulfilled the requirements of the EU directives. In particular, there was a question of whether the words 'with the purpose or effect of' (som syftar till eller leder till) should be inserted into the phrase 'conduct violating a person's dignity'. The Government concluded that a person's intent was not the key factor, given the wording of the directives that even unintended consequences could be discriminatory. In other words, it is the effects of the conduct that are decisive. It was also concluded that where conduct was intended to violate someone's dignity, but which has failed to do so, it can be said that no one has been disadvantaged. In that situation, there is no one who can make a claim for discrimination, nor is there anyone who can ask for redress or compensation.⁶⁵ Although it is possible to question Sweden's compliance given the wording of the directive, there is some logic to the Swedish position. It is worth noting that Article 2(3) of the Racial Equality Directive states, 'the concept of harassment may be defined in accordance with the national laws and practice of the Member States.'

The legislative materials state the following points in relation to the concept of harassment. The behaviour at issue must be unwelcome and it is the victim's assessment that determines whether the behaviour or actions are unwelcome. At the same time, the harasser must have had an insight that her or his behaviour was offensive in a way that could constitute discrimination. In order to be successful, the person harassed, in practice, should thus make it clear to the harasser that the behaviour is perceived to be offensive.

Finally, the materials also state that certain behaviours are so offensive that this should be clear to the harasser, meaning that no particular indication from the person who has been harassed is needed. There must also be a connection to one of the discrimination grounds.⁶⁶

In any case, the material scope is wide. In general, all six forms of discrimination apply in all areas. There is no area where harassment is exempted.

b) Scope of liability for harassment

In Sweden, where harassment is perpetrated by an employee, the employee is almost never liable.⁶⁷ The employer is liable if the harasser was in a managerial position or if the employer was informed about the harassment and failed to investigate and prevent it.

In working life, the prohibition applies to the employer in the employment context. The employer may be a natural or a legal person. Under Chapter 2, Section 1 of the Discrimination Act, a person who has the right to make decisions on the employer's behalf in matters concerning the employee shall be equated with the employer. An employer can thus only be made responsible for employees who are given such authority to represent the employer in relation to other employees – i.e. management at different levels. A fellow worker lacks such authorisation concerning their fellow workers; thus, an individual employee cannot sue another employee for harassment under the Discrimination Act.

Nevertheless, there is some protection concerning harassment between employees. According to Chapter 2, Section 3 of the Discrimination Act:

'If an employer becomes aware that an employee considers that he or she has been subjected in connection with work to harassment or sexual harassment by someone performing work or carrying out a traineeship at the employer's establishment, the employer is obliged to investigate the circumstances surrounding the alleged harassment and where appropriate take the measures that can reasonably be demanded to prevent harassment in the future.'

This obligation also applies with respect to a person carrying out a traineeship or performing work as temporary or borrowed labour.

An employer can thus become liable for the damages that result due to the employer's failure to investigate and implement reasonable measures to prevent harassment by another employee. This indicates that this law does not apply to harassment by clients. However, it is possible that this situation will be covered by the various rules related to an employer's responsibility for the work environment, which includes responsibility for the psycho-social work environment (1977 Work Environment Act).

2.5 Instructions to discriminate (Article 2(4))

a) Prohibition of instructions to discriminate

In Sweden, instructions to discriminate are prohibited in national law. The prohibition of instructions to discriminate is defined.

Instructions to discriminate constitute an explicit form of discrimination. This constitutes one of the six forms of discrimination enumerated in the Discrimination Act. Chapter 1, Section 4(6) defines it as follows:

⁶⁷ Harassment might under some circumstances fall under a section in Chapter 5 of the Penal Code (defamation etc.).

'Instructions to discriminate: orders or instructions to discriminate against someone⁶⁸ in a manner referred to in points 1–5 that are given to someone who is in a subordinate or dependent position relative to the person who gives the orders or instructions or to someone who has committed herself or himself to performing an assignment for that person.'

The material scope is thus wide. There is no area where instructions to discriminate are exempted.

b) Scope of liability for instructions to discriminate

In Sweden, the person giving the instructions is liable for issuing the instruction to discriminate if, in addition to there being a subordinate, a dependency or an assignment relationship, a disadvantageous effect has occurred in regard to one or more persons. If such an effect does not occur, then the instruction does not violate the Discrimination Act. Basically, this means that the person receiving the instruction must have acted in accordance with the instruction. There is one exception indicated in the legislative materials. If the instruction points out a specific person (or several specific persons) as the target of discrimination, that person has had his rights violated (blivit kränkt), and there is thus a violation of the prohibition against discrimination. This can occur if, for example, gossip develops due to the instruction, even if the instruction was never carried out.⁶⁹

If an employer instructs an employment agency to discriminate, both will be liable for a violation of the law – the employer for the instruction and the employment agency for the discrimination. However, if the instruction is not carried out there will be no violation of the law.

On the other hand, if such an instruction is given to an employee and the employee discriminates, the employer will be responsible for both violations. First, there is liability for the instruction; secondly, there is liability for the actions of employees (principalansvar).

Regarding health, social security, goods and services and most other areas, the service provider is responsible for the actions that an employee takes in relation to a customer or a client.

2.6 Reasonable accommodation duties (Article 2(2)(b)(ii) and Article 5 Directive 2000/78)

a) Implementation of the duty to provide reasonable accommodation for people with disabilities in the area of employment

In Sweden, the duty on employers to provide reasonable accommodation for people with disabilities is included in the law. It was covered by the 2009 Discrimination Act.⁷⁰ The law was changed in 2015 to extend the concept of reasonable accommodation to cover not only employment but also other areas of social life, such as education and access to goods and services. It is currently defined under 'inadequate accessibility'.⁷¹ Even though the ⁶⁸ If a group has been discriminated against, each person goes to court as an individual or makes an individual complaint with the Equality Ombudsman. It is easy to deal with many such cases together in a single process if many persons have been discriminated against in the same way by the same discriminator. A group of persons cannot be a discriminator. It is only the person (actual or legal) who is legally responsible for the activity that is regarded as a discriminator.

wording of the law was changed, the Government was clear in pointing out that previous rules related to reasonable accommodation in employment were not affected by the change in the Discrimination Act. Furthermore, the Government emphasised the idea that, in general, reasonable accommodation in relation to employment carried more weight as compared to other areas covered by inadequate accessibility, due to the nature of the employment relationship.⁷²

Inadequate accessibility was added as a form of discrimination to the Discrimination Act (Chapter 1, Section 4(3)) from 1 January 2015. The other forms of discrimination are direct, indirect, harassment, sexual harassment and instructions to discriminate. Inadequate accessibility applies to most of the areas covered by the act.⁷³ Before 2015 – when ‘reasonable accommodation’ was the term used – a lack of reasonable accommodation could result in direct discrimination, because the comparable situation should be assessed as if the worker or student had been accommodated. Also, reasonable accommodation did not apply to other areas, such as access to goods and services.

The current term is written in such a way that it is supposed to accommodate every area where the new broadened prohibition applies. In other words, the reasonable accommodation duty applies not only to working life, but also to areas of social life, such as education and access to goods and services.

It is defined as follows:

*‘Inadequate accessibility’*⁷⁴ that a person with disability is disadvantaged through a failure to take measures for accessibility to enable the person to come into a situation comparable with that of persons without this disability where such measures are reasonable on the basis of accessibility requirements in laws and other statutes, and with consideration to:

- the financial and practical conditions;
- the duration and nature of the relationship or contact between the operator and the individual; and
- other circumstances of relevance.⁷⁵

This change has little practical importance in the field of employment as – according to the legislative preparatory works – the previous rules continue to apply with regard to accommodation measures in employment. The protection is, however, extended to cover trainees in basic and secondary education. The expansion in coverage primarily related to fields other than employment.⁷⁶

The availability of financial assistance from the state concerning reasonable accommodation can be taken into account, depending on the circumstances, in assessing whether the accommodation is a disproportionate burden.⁷⁷

⁷² Government bill 2013/14:198, pp. 128-129.

⁷⁵ These three elements are assumed to equate to the ‘disproportionate burden’ test.

⁷⁷ See e.g. Labour Court 2017 No. 51, Equality Ombudsman v Södertörn University and Fransson-Stüber (2015), Diskrimineringslagen: en kommentar (The Discrimination Act: A Commentary) and Section 2.6.b below on case law.

Since the case law is limited, it is not easy to specify what accommodations will be classified as reasonable support and accommodation measures in accordance with Swedish law. It is also difficult to specify what would be recognised as a disproportionate burden and thus be seen as going beyond what is reasonable with regard to support and adaptation measures.⁷⁸ The following accommodation measures were mentioned in the legislative materials accompanying the 2009 Discrimination Act as examples of requirements of measures to be taken by an employer: improvements related to physical accessibility, the acquisition of technical support, and changes in work tasks, time schedules or working methods.⁷⁹

The reasonableness of requiring measures to be undertaken can vary depending on the employer. This determination must be made from case to case, depending on such factors as the employee's needs, as well as the employer's ability to bear the costs, the ability to undertake a measure, the problems caused for the employer by the measure and the expected length of the employment. Government subsidies for reasonable accommodation measures can be taken into account if it is clear, for example, during the recruitment process, that a subsidy will be received.⁸⁰

General legislation outside the field of discrimination is important here, especially the 1977 Working Environment Act and the employer's duty to undertake 'rehabilitation measures'⁸¹ regarding those who are already employed, in combination with the 1982 Employment Protection Act, which imposes a duty of fairly far-reaching accommodation.⁸² These duties are sometimes more far reaching than those of the Discrimination Act. However, these far-reaching obligations apply only if the worker has a good chance of returning to work for the employer in question.

b) Case law

Labour Court case 2013 No. 78 indicates that the court is reluctant to ask the employer to permanently⁸³ change a fellow worker's tasks in way that makes his or her work worse in order to provide an accommodation for the sake of the work of a person with a disability. The case concerned a bus driver who – due to a stroke – could not work more than 50 % and could not, among other things, drive during the early mornings and late evenings, or in certain types of traffic. Creating such a schedule for another worker could not be required of the employer, and the disabled worker was dismissed.⁸⁴

In a case from 2017, the Labour Court found that there was no discrimination when a university refused to hire a lecturer who was deaf. The Equality Ombudsman and the university agreed that an interpreter between sign language and spoken language was needed. The cost to the employer was disputed with regard to, inter alia, how much could be financed with employment policy allowances. The Labour Court started by assessing the case as if the Equality Ombudsman had done the correct cost assessment of EUR 49 000

(approximately SEK 520 000) per year as a net cost for the education provider. That cost was considered excessive (unreasonable), and the Ombudsman lost the case.⁸⁵ Concerning this case, in 2020, the UN Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities issued a decision that was highly critical of Sweden and the manner in which reasonable accommodation was dealt with in this case, particularly the failure to engage in a dialogue with the job applicant.⁸⁶

Although it would be wrong to say that a great deal of clarity has been brought to the topic, a number of cases in 2020 have involved the issue of reasonable accommodation. For more details, see Section 12.2 below.

In the field of labour law, the Police Authority admitted that it had failed to live up to its duty to adequately investigate the need for additional accommodation measures concerning a probationary employee, thus accepting responsibility for discrimination in the form of inadequate accessibility. The employee however failed in their attempt to assert that the Police Authority was also liable for indirect discrimination, which would have led to the right to receive economic damages and not just discrimination compensation.⁸⁷

c) Definition of disability and non-discrimination protection

The definition of disability is the same in all areas of the Discrimination Act. As set out in Chapter 1, Section 5(4), disability means:

'Long-lasting physical, mental or intellectual limitation of a person's functional capacity that as a consequence of an injury or illness that existed at birth, has arisen since then or can be expected to arise.'

The definition is thus stated in general terms, a requirement being that the limitations in functional capacity must be long lasting. For more information, see Section 2.1.1.c above.

The definition of a disability for the purposes of claiming reasonable accommodation is not different from the one for claiming protection from non-discrimination in general.

d) Failure to meet the duty of reasonable accommodation for people with disabilities

In Sweden, failure to meet the duty of reasonable accommodation in employment for people with disabilities is recognised as a form of discrimination. This failure amounts to inadequate accessibility for an individual, which is a separate form of discrimination – and the third in a list of six forms of discrimination under the Discrimination Act (see Section 2.6.a above). Inadequate accessibility is a free-standing form of discrimination in relation to, for example, direct and indirect discrimination.

One difficulty with the idea of reasonable accommodation involves the burden of proof. The claimant must at least suggest the potential accommodation after which the burden shifts to the defendant concerning the lack of reasonableness. In order to assert the reasonableness of the need for accommodation, the cost of the accommodation has to somehow be assessed. It is not clear who has to determine the reasonableness of an accommodation and how it can be proven. Is it enough for a defendant to simply assert that the cost would be prohibitive? In a Labour Court case from 2010, a visually impaired job applicant asserted discrimination by the Social Insurance Agency when it failed to provide various types of reasonable accommodation. The defendant provided testimony concerning unreasonableness which was seemingly enough to convince the court. The court may have made the right decision, yet it still seems that in practice the claimant bore the burden of proving the reasonableness of the accommodation sought – regardless of the shifting of the burden of proof.

⁸⁵ Labour Court 2017 No. 51, Equality Ombudsman v Södertörn University. There was thus no need for the Labour Court to assess whether or not the true cost was higher, as the university claimed.

- e) Duties to provide reasonable accommodation in areas other than employment for people with disabilities

In Sweden, there is a duty to provide reasonable accommodation for people with disabilities outside the area of employment.

Since 2015, there has been a duty to provide reasonable accommodation for people with disabilities in most of the areas where the Discrimination Act applies. This duty, (as discussed above in subsection a), is contained within the prohibition of the form of discrimination known as 'inadequate accessibility'.⁸⁸ The areas covered are working life, education, labour market policy activities and employment services not under public contract, starting or running a business and professional recognition, membership of certain organisations, services, meetings or public events, health and medical care and social services, the social insurance system, unemployment insurance and financial aid for studies, national military service and civilian service, and public employment.

Before 2015, the prohibition of discrimination by education providers applied when, by taking 'reasonable measures regarding the accessibility and usability of the premises, they can see to it that a person with a disability' is put in a comparable situation to people without such a disability.⁸⁹ This duty applied to higher education only. Today's rules on inadequate accessibility apply throughout the education sector.

The Education Act (2010:800) contains a duty to accept pupils at the school of their choice unless the financial burden required is substantial (Chapter 9, Section 15). Under the provisions introduced in 2015, a violation of the Education Act can also result in discrimination according to the rules on inadequate accessibility in the Discrimination Act.

One example of an area where the new rules do not apply is a landlord having a tenant who becomes disabled. The landlord might not agree to the installations that would be necessary for the tenant to remain in the apartment. The fact that the municipality would have been obliged to grant an allowance for the installation, as well as paying for their future removal, does not include a duty for the landlord to permit them. Discrimination law is based on comparisons between persons with disabilities and persons without disabilities, and persons without disabilities have very limited rights to make installations in rented apartments. If the 2015 rules had been applied to housing, this situation could have changed but, according to Chapter 2, Section 12c of the Discrimination Act, the prohibition of discrimination in the form of inadequate accessibility does not apply with regard to housing.⁹⁰

There is still little case law on the rules on inadequate accessibility. However, as they rely heavily on laws and other forms of legislation to provide the accommodation level that can be required,⁹¹ the biggest change is probably that a discrimination award as a remedy becomes possible, which is valuable for the claimant, especially if civil damages were not possible before. Many public law regulations have conditional fines that are payable to the state as the main sanction – i.e. a court order linked to a financial penalty if not followed.

⁸⁸ Act 2014 (958) on changing the Discrimination Act (2008:567), adopted on 08.07.2014; Government bill 2013/14:198. According to Chapter 2 Section 12 c, the prohibition of discrimination in the form of a lack of reasonable accommodation (inadequate accessibility) does not apply to housing, private persons offering services or goods to the general population or if the measure in question concerns goods and services and the buildings where they are offered, and the claimant seeks actions that go beyond what was required when the building was made.

In the Discrimination Act, the term 'inadequate accessibility' basically assumes that the accessibility standards already set in other laws and statutes are adequate. For instance, the Education Act establishes a minimum standard of accessibility that also encompasses an individualised duty of reasonable accommodation. If that standard is fulfilled, there will be no examination of inadequate accessibility based on the Discrimination Act. Thus, the introduction of this form of discrimination in the Discrimination Act does not create any new duties in regard to the accessibility standards already established in other laws and regulations.

In a situation such as that of schools, where there is a clear legal duty to provide accommodation through administrative law, the Discrimination Act still helps by providing potential sanctions (discrimination compensation) that may be more effective than those in other laws and regulations, which often only provide for the imposition of conditional fines by a Government authority.⁹² The concept of inadequate accessibility is – in those situations – related to accommodation required by other legislation.⁹³

A 2019 case, Malmö mot diskriminering (MmD) v Malmö stad, illustrates the interplay between the Discrimination Act and the Education Act. The city of Malmö took more than a year to investigate and adapt the schooling situation with regard to A's learning disabilities. Malmö was required to do so due to the requirements of Chapter 3 of the Education Act. After receiving a complaint, the Schools Inspectorate concluded that the school should have been much quicker in developing and implementing the special measures related to A's needs. MmD was able to use the Inspectorate's decision, among other factors, for its lawsuit against Malmö. The district court determined that A had been subjected to a violation of the Discrimination Act in the form of inadequate accessibility and awarded EUR 1 900 (SEK 20 000) in discrimination compensation.⁹⁴ The Appeal Court upheld the decision of the district court.⁹⁵

Inadequate accessibility outside working life and its interplay with other regulations was examined for the first time in a 2017 case concerning a pupil who used a wheelchair and who had for three years attended a school with inadequate access ramps. In particular, he was required to use ramps that were steep or without railings. On two occasions, his wheelchair tipped over as a consequence. The school and the municipality were aware of these issues but failed to act appropriately. The district court held that this was discrimination in the form of inadequate accessibility, resulting in an award to the pupil of approximately EUR 2 800 (SEK 30 000) from the municipality. Due to the gravity of the circumstances, the Equality Ombudsman appealed the case in order to obtain a higher discrimination compensation award. On 15 May 2018, Göta Appeal Court increased the award to EUR 7 000 (SEK 75 000).⁹⁶

It should be pointed out that the idea was not to create a definition of inadequate accessibility that could be used to impose high costs on service providers when accommodation is not required by other legislation. This can be seen in the wording of the act as well as in the legislative preparatory works. Nevertheless, the act does impose new accommodation duties.⁹⁷

Outside the labour market, the prohibition of this form of discrimination is complementary, but subsidiary to other legislation that provides for accessibility, such as building regulations, and extends a duty of reasonable accommodation to, for example, providers of goods and services. The changes to the act (the introduction in 2015 of new legal demands exemplified in the legislative preparatory works),⁹⁸ are such that the relevant actions were probably undertaken even where there was no legal duty to do so. Before 2015, a restaurant could refuse to have a member of staff read the menu to a blind guest because a fully sighted guest did not have this right. However, in acting this way, the management would have been likely to offend not only the blind guest but also the majority of sighted people witnessing the refusal.

The difference between the restaurant example and the school example is that the Education Act has for a long time required all schools to make reasonable accommodations for pupils with disabilities, while there were no such duties for restaurants. Therefore, the new form of discrimination creates new duties for certain entities, such as restaurants, but not for schools.

The proportionality test is embedded in the definition of inadequate accessibility/lack of reasonable accommodation (see Section 2.6.a above). Given the examples in the legislative preparatory works, the room in which to apply this test seems limited when there is no special legislation to rely on.

If there is a determination that there has been a failure to meet the duty of reasonable accommodation, the principal sanctions are awards of discrimination compensation and the ability of the court to declare contract clauses and certain actions, such as dismissals, null and void in certain situations. What the duty will mean concerning the types of reasonable accommodation that can be demanded in various situations will depend on the development of case law.

Several similar cases concerning inadequate accessibility and pupils with dyslexia were decided in various trial courts during 2019. In Swedish schools, students in the third and sixth grades sit national exams. During such exams, students with dyslexia are not allowed to use the accessibility devices that they normally use during the school year, due to guidelines set by the National Agency for Education. The guidelines allow for only certain types of accommodation, such as a longer time period. Pupils with dyslexia considered this to be a failure to provide a reasonable accommodation in regard to their education. Their position, as well as that of various experts, is that they read with their ears rather than with their eyes. The national tests count toward pupils' final grades, which means the results can be detrimental for the pupil. Three cases were filed suing different local government bodies asserting, inter alia, that their schools, in carrying out the tests, violated the Discrimination Act in terms of indirect discrimination as well as inaccessibility.⁹⁹ Two courts found that there was no indirect discrimination since the procedure had a legitimate purpose and the means were appropriate and necessary and that the accessibility measures that were allowed, such as additional time, were sufficient to place the claimant in a comparable situation with that of a person without the disability. The third court determined that the local government was responsible due to indirect discrimination and discrimination due to inadequate accessibility. The court was basically saying that the use of the accessibility devices normally used was the reasonable accommodation required in this situation. All three cases were appealed.¹⁰⁰ In 2020, the appeal courts determined that there was no violation of the Discrimination Act, even though they also concluded that the pupils in question were disadvantaged by the lack of access to their assistance devices. However, they determined that the measures were appropriate and necessary, and the accommodations were sufficient. The courts also found that there was no violation of the European Convention on Human Rights concerning discrimination and the right to an education. The Supreme Court refused to grant leave for an appeal.¹⁰¹

These cases leave some open questions. For example, can it be asserted that it is actually the guidelines of the National School Agency that lead to discrimination, meaning that the national Government should be held responsible? A lawsuit to this effect was filed on 13 October 2020.

f) Duties to provide reasonable accommodation in respect of other grounds

There is no requirement in the Discrimination Act to provide reasonable accommodation in relation to grounds of discrimination other than disability in dealing with individual cases.

The form of discrimination known as inadequate accessibility does not apply to any ground other than disability. With regard to other grounds, the only viable option in the Discrimination Act perhaps involves relying on the concept of indirect discrimination.

With regard to religion, it is possible to assert that there is an underlying element of reasonable accommodation in relation to indirect discrimination in examining exceptions for a legitimate purpose where the means that are used are appropriate and necessary to achieve that purpose.

It could be said that the wearing of the niqab in schools raises the issue of a form of reasonable accommodation.¹⁰² In some cases, schools have asked a person to remove their niqab. Such demands (not allowing a partial or full face covering in class) formally apply to everyone, but particularly affect certain Muslims. This may involve indirect discrimination, depending on the proportionality or 'appropriate and necessary' test. A relevant question is whether the legitimate purpose could have been solved by other means. Potentially, reasonable accommodation is an underlying element in assessing various cases of indirect discrimination.¹⁰³

In the 2017 midwife case decided by the Labour Court,¹⁰⁴ the applicant was essentially seeking a reasonable accommodation from the employer, meaning that she would not have to take part in abortions due to her religious beliefs. Applying a proportionality test, the court found that the demands made by the employer were appropriate and necessary. Thus, there was no indirect discrimination.

A somewhat different situation featured in a 2017 appeal court case, where a Jehovah's witness in a public unemployment programme who was receiving an activity grant was asked to apply for a job at the Swedish National Lottery and Gambling Monopoly. His job would have involved selling companies packages of lottery tickets with the customer's logo on it so that they could give them out to employees or customers or use them for other promotional purposes. His job would thus not involve selling tickets to individuals. Given his religious convictions against gambling, he refused to go to the interview. He thus lost his place in the programme, including the activity grant. The court concluded that elements of indirect discrimination were present, and that the actions of the Government were disproportionate in relation to the negative consequences for the complainant. The state, given its evidence, failed to overcome the presumption of indirect discrimination.¹⁰⁵

In the author's opinion, while these cases do not necessarily clearly establish the idea of a reasonable accommodation duty outside the field of disability, the idea can be said to form part of the proportionality test that is to be applied in various indirect discrimination cases. These cases involved religion, which may have a special status, due to its connection to the concept of freedom of religion. Nevertheless, it can also be asserted that, given the right cases, the idea could arguably apply to other grounds as well.

¹⁰³ Equality Ombudsman, Case 2009/103 involved a school where these circumstances applied. In the end, the Ombudsman did not pursue the case because the school found alternative solutions.

3 PERSONAL AND MATERIAL SCOPE

3.1 Personal scope

3.1.1 EU and non-EU nationals (Recital 13 and Article 3(2), Directive 2000/43 and Recital 12 and Article 3(2), Directive 2000/78)

In Sweden there are no residence or citizenship/nationality requirements for protection under the relevant national laws transposing the directives.

In principle, persons with irregular status are entitled to the protection of the directives.

3.1.2 Natural and legal persons (Recital 16, Directive 2000/43)

a) Protection against discrimination

In Sweden, the personal scope of anti-discrimination law covers all-natural persons but does not cover legal persons for the purpose of protection against discrimination. This does not follow from a specific section. Some Sections of Chapter 2 of the Discrimination Act contain wording such as 'the jobseeker', 'the child, pupil or student' and so on, where it is obvious that a legal person cannot fall under the protected category. In other cases where the wording is unclear, there is a general statement in the legislative preparatory works that legal persons are not protected.¹⁰⁶

The Discrimination Act thus generally protects natural persons.¹⁰⁷ Nevertheless, as regards the act's applicability to working life, the general concept of 'employee' is a compulsory concept, which is not for the parties concerned to decide upon. Within this concept it is perfectly possible for the Labour Court, in the last instance, to look beyond or ignore the fact that a contract may be agreed between the employer and a legal entity run by the 'employee' alone.

In 2006, the Discrimination Inquiry Commission proposed a protection for legal persons in a number of (but not all) areas covered by non-discrimination legislation.¹⁰⁸ Most of the consultation responses were positive, with several of the discrimination ombudsmen at the time asserting that the proposal should go further. However, the Government rejected this in the final bill that became law, indicating that further analysis was needed and that coverage of legal persons was not an explicit requirement of the directives.¹⁰⁹ Thus legal persons still have no explicit protection, which is potentially a problem in relation to Directive 2000/43.

b) Liability for discrimination

In Sweden, the personal scope of anti-discrimination law covers natural and legal persons for the purpose of liability for discrimination. The different Sections of Chapter 2 of the Discrimination Act refer to the 'employer', the 'service provider' and so on. It is clear from the wording that both natural and legal persons are covered.

In one interesting example, Labour Court case 2007 No. 45, the employee who sent a discriminatory email to a job applicant was not authorised to make decisions regarding the job application of the Iranian job applicant concerned.¹¹⁰ The employee did not represent the employer on this issue, thus the email that was sent was outside the scope of their employment. The court therefore held that there was no violation of the Discrimination Act for which the employer was liable. It should be pointed out that the employer never argued or demonstrated that the lack of authorisation was known about or should have been known about by the Iranian applicant. This restriction on the vicarious liability of employers limits the scope of the prohibition on discrimination in a way that could be problematic in relation to EU law. In the author's opinion, there is a question of whether even Swedish law was applied properly in this case.¹¹¹

Labour Court case 2011 No. 19¹¹² is another example of a case where there was a question as to the extent of an employer's liability for employees or others who are said to be acting on behalf of their employer. Here, a trainee applicant participated in an interview with S.F., an independent contractor in a hair salon. The issue was whether S.F. represented herself or C.N., the beauty salon employer. The interview by S.F. and C.N.'s subsequent refusal to offer a trainee position were asserted to be discriminatory due to, among other things, comments about the applicant's headscarf during the interview. The court did not find that the applicant, acting through the DO, had shown that S.F. was acting on behalf of C.N. as the potential employer of the trainee. Thus, the applicant lost the case based on legal reasoning regarding which employees or other persons an employer is responsible for.

3.1.3 Private and public sector including public bodies (Article 3(1))

a) Protection against discrimination

In Sweden, the personal scope of national anti-discrimination law (the Discrimination Act) does not cover the private and public sectors, including public bodies, for the purpose of protection against discrimination. The protection does not extend to legal persons. However, in general, natural persons in both the private and the public sectors are covered by the protection against discrimination. The national provisions are presumed to comply with the directives.

b) Liability for discrimination

In Sweden, the personal scope of anti-discrimination law covers the private sector and the public sector, including public bodies, for the purpose of liability for discrimination.

The prohibitions for different areas in Chapter 2 of the Discrimination Act are applicable to both the private and public sectors, including public bodies. The limitation on the applicability of the Discrimination Act relates to activity areas and not to the public or private sector or to who is responsible for the activity.

A situation where the Discrimination Act does not apply is one in which a police officer is arresting a criminal, even if the officer is carrying out her or his official duties in a discriminatory manner. However, if the same police officer gives advice to an ordinary citizen an hour later and treats this citizen unfavourably for a reason connected to a ground of discrimination, this activity may fall under the Discrimination Act (Chapter 2, Section 17). In such a case, it will be the Police Authority (at the appropriate level) that will be held responsible under the Discrimination Act. It is the employers, the service providers etc. that are held responsible under Chapter 2 of the Discrimination Act – it does not matter whether they are a natural or legal person, nor whether it is a public or a private body.

The court held that the union representatives were not acting on behalf of the employer and had no liability for the actions of the union.

3.2 Material scope

3.2.1 Conditions for access to employment, to self-employment or to occupation, including selection criteria, recruitment conditions and promotion, whatever the branch of activity and at all levels of the professional hierarchy (Article 3(1)(a))

In Sweden, national legislation prohibits discrimination in the following areas: conditions for access to employment, self-employment or occupation, including selection criteria, recruitment conditions and promotion, whatever the branch of activity and at all levels of the professional hierarchy, for the five grounds, in both private and public sectors, as described in the directives.

The Discrimination Act covers the self-employed with regard to starting or running a business and professional recognition (Chapter 2, Section 10). Professional organisations are prohibited from discriminating against the self-employed as well as the employed (Chapter 2, Section 11). Permits, certification and financial support are examples of areas covered by these two provisions. There are other provisions in the Discrimination Act that apply to self-employed persons as well as to employed persons and that offer both groups the same protection. A self-employed person can also be discriminated against by a service provider if he or she needs a service as a customer or client (Chapter 2, Section 12), for instance if a painter buys a car for his firm.

However, no prohibition in the Discrimination Act is applicable between two or more self-employed business partners. For example, suppose that a private company needs a big paint job carried out, for which they want to hire four different persons. Three of them raise objections against the fourth because of her religion or sex. They convince the company not to give her a contract and to give the job to someone else – or, if she gets the contract, they harass her. There is no specific prohibition that covers this scenario. In his report of 28 July 2004, the Ombudsman Against Discrimination due to Sexual Orientation, Hans Ytterberg, made the following remark:

‘With respect to self-employment, the [now repealed 1999 Sexual Orientation Discrimination Act] does not seem to fully implement the directive. Self-employed business partners, for example, apparently are not protected against harassment or other forms of discrimination from one another, a situation which to me clearly seems to be covered by the directive (see Arts. 2(3) and 3 of the directive). It is also a situation which has appeared in the requests for advice and support that the Ombudsman’s office has come across since the entering into force of the Act.’¹¹³

This criticism can be directed at the 2009 Discrimination Act as well.¹¹⁴

3.2.2 Employment and working conditions, including pay and dismissals (Article 3(1)(c))

In Sweden, the Discrimination Act prohibits discrimination in working conditions including pay and dismissals, for all five grounds and for both private and public employment.

Chapter 2, Section 1 of the Discrimination Act speaks of any discrimination against a worker, jobseeker etc., and therefore applies to all forms of working conditions including pay and dismissals.

¹¹³ See the quote in Numhauser-Henning, A. (2005) Report on Measures to Combat Discrimination, Directives 2000/43/EC and 2000/78/EC, Country report Sweden 2005, p. 35.

3.2.3 Access to all types and all levels of vocational guidance, vocational training, advanced vocational training and retraining, including practical work experience (Article 3(1)(b))

In Sweden, the Discrimination Act prohibits discrimination in vocational training outside the employment relationship, such as adult lifelong learning courses or vocational training provided by technical schools or universities.

The prohibition of discrimination in the education sector applies to all sorts of education providers, from those teaching small children to those teaching university students. It applies to all forms of education including vocational training. In Sweden, the phrase 'vocational training' is not used as an official category when distinguishing between different forms of education. Chapter 2 Section 1(3) of the Discrimination Act clearly prohibits discrimination when a person applies for or participates in training with an employer, and Sections 5-8 will apply to the education provider if responsibility for the training is shared between the employer and, for instance, a school. Those sections should always be read in conjunction with the definition of the six forms of discrimination in Chapter 1, Section 4 of the Discrimination Act.

3.2.4 Membership of, and involvement in, an organisation of workers or employers, or any organisation whose members carry on a particular profession, including the benefits provided for by such organisations (Article 3(1)(d))

In Sweden, the Discrimination Act prohibits discrimination in membership of and involvement in workers' or employers' organisations as formulated in the directives for all five grounds and for both private and public employment.

Chapter 2, Section 11 of the Discrimination Act provides that discrimination on all seven grounds is forbidden in relation to membership or participation in an association of employees (i.e. a labour union), an association of employers or a professional organisation, and the benefits awarded by such organisations to their members.

The prohibitions concerning different areas in Chapter 2 should always be read in conjunction with the definition of the six forms of discrimination in Chapter 1, Section 4 of the Discrimination Act.

3.2.5 Social protection, including social security and healthcare (Article 3(1)(e) Directive 2000/43)

In Sweden, the Discrimination Act prohibits discrimination in social protection, including social security and healthcare, as formulated in the Racial Equality Directive.

Health and medical care, social services, state financial aid for studies, social insurance and related benefit systems are included in the Discrimination Act in Chapter 2, Sections 13-14. All of the Act's discrimination grounds are covered, including age, disability, religion or belief and sexual orientation. With regard to age there is an exception for age limits set down in law with regard to health and social insurance (including student benefits), and it is generally possible to justify direct age discrimination subject to a proportionality test in most areas.

a) Article 3.3 exception (Directive 2000/78)

Sweden's Discrimination Act does not rely on Article 3(3) of Directive 2000/78.

3.2.6 Social advantages (Article 3(1)(f) Directive 2000/43)

In Sweden, the Discrimination Act prohibits discrimination in relation to social advantages as formulated in the Racial Equality Directive.

All of the Act's discrimination grounds are covered, including age, disability, religion or belief and sexual orientation.

The Discrimination Act should meet the requirement of Article 3(1)(f) of Directive 2000/43/EC. Discounts on services such as trains and municipal leisure facilities fall under the provision on goods, services and housing (Chapter 2, Section 12). Discounts will thus in principle fall under the prohibition. Discounts for persons with disabilities will always be allowed, as the disadvantaged group (persons without disabilities) is not protected by the Discrimination Act. Discounts based on age can be justified on the basis of a proportionality test, depending on the circumstances according to Chapter 2, Section 12b (4) of the Discrimination Act. Since the Discrimination Act covers all the areas required by Directive 2000/43, there will always be a section applicable to a discriminatory discount excluding certain groups. If the discount concerns the health sector, Chapter 2, Section 13 applies; if the social advantage is a social security benefit, Chapter 2, Section 14 applies.

The crime of unlawful discrimination set out in the Swedish Penal Code (16:9) contains some provisions making it a criminal offence for anyone running a private business to treat customers unfavourably in the provision of goods and services because of their sexual orientation, religion or ethnicity. The provision also covers anyone employed in such a private enterprise or acting on behalf of it, as well as anyone acting in their capacity of employee within the public administration, when dealing with the public. This means that discriminatory treatment in areas such as healthcare, education and social security can be considered a criminal offence under certain circumstances.

The author cannot think of a single example of a social advantage under the directive that does not fall under one of the areas where the Swedish Discrimination Act applies.

3.2.7 Education (Article 3(1)(g) Directive 2000/43)

In Sweden, the Discrimination Act prohibits discrimination in relation to education as formulated in the Racial Equality Directive.

The relevant provisions are in Chapter 2, Sections 5-8 of the Discrimination Act. The prohibition of discrimination applies to all grounds, and the forms of discrimination are described in Chapter 1, Section 4 of the Discrimination Act. Chapter 2, Section 5 of the Act prohibits discrimination in regard to all levels of education, from pre-schools to universities. This broad scope led to the use of the term education provider in the Act.

There are three primary Government agencies that deal with schools: the Swedish National Agency for Education, Swedish Schools Inspectorate, and the National Agency for Special Needs Education and Schools. According to Chapter 1, Section 4 of the Swedish Education Act (2010:800) a basic idea guiding all Swedish schools is that everyone should have access to an equivalent education. As a part of this, the education should take into account the different needs of pupils. Support and stimulation are to be provided so that pupils can develop and grow as much as possible. In principle, this means that a starting point is a focus on all children, given their different needs, and not a separate categorisation of pupils in need of special support with special rights. Schools, healthcare and social services are to cooperate in regard to pupils at risk.

Of the 950 000 pupils in compulsory schools, only about 500 attend state-run special schools. Thus, most pupils in need of special support are in general basic compulsory classes. If this is not possible, schools must very clearly indicate why other educational options should be considered. Previously, the debates focused on prerequisites for mainstreaming, whereas now the focus has shifted to the need to justify segregated options for pupils.¹¹⁵

Children with learning disabilities can attend mainstream compulsory schools or compulsory schools for pupils with learning disabilities. An action plan must be drawn up for pupils in need of special support. The plans are usually developed by teachers in consultation with pupils, their parents and specialist support teachers (Chapter 3, Sections 6-12). Special support will be provided depending on the needs. There are also a number of special schools that are available for pupils with particular needs related to e.g., visual or hearing impairments or certain other more severe issues. According to the Education Act, all pupils, in principle, have the right to choose their school, assuming the school can meet their needs.

The National Agency for Special Needs Education and Schools, SPSM, works to ensure that children, young people and adults – regardless of functional ability – have adequate conditions to fulfil their educational goals. SPSM has a broad knowledge of the educational consequences of disabilities as well as special needs support, education in special needs schools and accessible teaching materials.

Sweden has the ambition of ensuring that all pupils, including those with special needs, receive an education that corresponds to their potential. This does not mean that there are no problems concerning discrimination against pupils with disabilities. For example, see Section 12.2 below concerning the pupils with dyslexia who asserted that their schools, following the instructions of the Swedish National Agency for Education, did not allow them to use the assistance devices they used daily in school, during the national exams. The Education Agency asserted that the devices would mean that the ability of students to comprehend reading materials would not be tested. It is noteworthy that SPSM, the Swedish agency specialised in such issues, submitted a statement to the courts pointing out that some pupils read with their fingers, some with their eyes and some with their ears. In spite of this, the pupils lost their appeals.

a) Trends and patterns regarding Roma pupils

In Sweden, there is a pattern of discrimination regarding Roma pupils.

In Sweden, Roma pupils encounter severe obstacles in the education system. To a large extent, however, intentional segregation is not currently the cause of this. Roma people often live in relatively acceptable housing conditions and go to the same schools as the children of the majority 'ethnic Swedes'. If they want to learn Romani Chib (the Romani language) the policy is that they should be provided with extra lessons at no cost, like the children of other national minorities.

The specific situation of Roma in the Swedish schooling system with regard to discrimination is described in the report of the former Ombudsman against Ethnic Discrimination, Discrimination against Roma in Sweden from 2004, which was followed up in the 2012 report by the Equality Ombudsman, Roma Rights (Romers rättigheter). The work carried out on discrimination complaints concerning Roma can be seen in the reports above. The subjects of these complaints cover public services, housing and employment. A general overview can be found in a report from the Swedish National Agency for Education, Roma in School (Romer i skolan).¹¹⁶

¹¹⁶ National Agency for Education (Skolverket) (2007), Romer i skolan (Roma in School) Report 2007 No. 292.

It is said to be hard for Roma youths to benefit from their rights to education on equal terms due to structural obstacles. In 2008, the DO produced the report 'Discrimination of National Minorities in the Education System' (2008:2). One important weak spot is the implementation of the right to education in minority languages.

Municipalities have a duty to arrange minority language education, although it is difficult to assert that people have the right to demand it. One pupil is enough to activate this duty. However, when the Swedish National Agency for Education reported back to the Government in November 2013, 6 % of school heads said that the conditions necessary to provide language education in Romani Chib did not exist.¹¹⁷ As a part of the national Roma strategy, five municipalities have become pilot areas and received state funding for, inter alia, improving education. In these municipalities, Roma pupils were seldom encouraged to take the minority language classes, and the problems of finding qualified teachers sometimes led the municipalities to hope for low attendance.¹¹⁸

Some important legal background to this discussion is provided by a case that the Equality Ombudsman took to court, claiming that the failure to provide language education in Romani Chib violates the now repealed 2006 Act on a ban against discrimination and other degrading treatment of children and pupils. The Equality Ombudsman argued that, with regard to national minorities, the treatment of children with Swedish as their mother tongue is the relevant measurement of a comparable situation.¹¹⁹ If they actively seek such a teacher on the national labour market, for instance, they should be equally active in finding a teacher in Romani Chib.

The Ombudsman lost the case.¹²⁰ The district court stated that the relevant measurement of a comparable situation lay with other minorities. The municipality had not worked less hard to find teachers of Romani Chib compared with the mother tongues of other minorities, including refugees. The judgment was appealed, but Göta Court of Appeal decided not to grant the request to appeal.¹²¹ From this case it follows that, even though there is a duty for municipalities to provide minority language education, there is no effective legal remedy if this does not happen. There is no corresponding right on the part of the pupil to require this education.

In the 2013 report, a majority of school heads reported that their schools did not teach from a Swedish Roma perspective with regard to Roma culture, language, history or religion.¹²² In 2014, detailed information was produced in order to assist schools regarding how a Roma perspective could be introduced concerning Swedish history, societal knowledge and so on.¹²³ Each school has been given both materials for pupils and guidance for teachers.¹²⁴

An overall assessment of the current right of Roma children to an education was made in a 2019 master's thesis. The author of the thesis concluded that although Sweden has taken some important measures, such as education in schools concerning Roma culture and history and the use of Roma teaching assistants and bridge-builders, at the same time, there is a tendency to focus on Roma attitudes to education as a problem, while too little is being done to deal with structural discrimination in Sweden and its education system.¹²⁵ The assessment, by the author of the master's thesis, that there are problems with the strategy is to some extent based on a 2018 report by the Swedish National Agency for Education.¹²⁶

The author of this report finds it fair to say that the authorities are paying some attention to the Roma situation. However, the individual rights approach of the Discrimination Act is largely absent from this work with regard to education as well as the importance that individual rights enforcement can also have on structural discrimination. Furthermore, despite the ongoing Government work, the activities being carried out lack a sufficiently meaningful empowerment perspective in the author's opinion.

3.2.8 Access to and supply of goods and services that are available to the public (Article 3(1)(h) Directive 2000/43)

In Sweden, the Discrimination Act prohibits discrimination in access to and the supply of goods and services, as formulated in the Racial Equality Directive.

The prohibition of discrimination concerning goods, services and housing in Chapter 2, Section 12 of the Discrimination Act applies to all grounds (including age, disability, religion or belief and sexual orientation), and to all forms of discrimination as described in Chapter 1, Section 4 of the Discrimination Act. In particular Chapter 1, Section 4(3) concerning inadequate accessibility covers the failure to adapt goods or a service to meet the needs of a person with a disability as a form of discrimination.

The prohibition of all forms of discrimination applies to the disability ground with regard to goods, services and housing (although inadequate accessibility is sometimes exempted).¹²⁷ This has been the case since the 2003 Goods and Services Act. Insurance companies frequently use medical conditions for risk assessments, and there is no need for a legal exception. In 2011, in the Trygg Hansa case, Stockholm District Court stated:¹²⁸

'Discrimination is when a person has had a less favourable treatment compared to other persons in the same risk group. The equal treatment requirement shall thus not be interpreted as meaning that persons with different risks of for instance developing a medical problem shall be granted insurance on the same terms.'

Therefore, the court found that it was correct of the insurance company to deny sickness insurance to a child with a hearing problem. The company could not establish whether the hearing problem had a root cause that made other illnesses more likely. Until this information was available, it could not design an individualised contract with higher fees or exemptions. Since this was impossible, it was not discriminatory to deny insurance altogether. The Equality Ombudsman did not appeal this verdict.

The Government has been particularly concerned about providing an exception in the Discrimination Act concerning age and discrimination related to goods and services. Chapter 2, Section 12b states:

'The prohibition of discrimination in Section 12 associated with age;

1. does not prevent the application of provisions of an act in which a certain age is prescribed,
2. does not apply to the provision of insurance services,
3. does not prevent the application of lower age limits for admission to establishments where spirit drinks, wine, strong beer and other fermented alcoholic beverages which the business operator is licensed to serve are served on a commercial basis, and
4. does not prevent other differential treatment on grounds of age either if the differential treatment serves a legitimate purpose and the means that are used are appropriate and necessary to achieve that purpose.'

These exceptions are clearly much broader than any of those that apply to other grounds. The breadth of the exceptions indicates the Government's understanding of the extent to which age is used as a defining category within society and the difficulties of applying discrimination as a concept to those same categories.

According to the author, the situation with regard to disability is problematic. An exception is necessary with regard to age and the insurance sector, because actuarially correct assessments would, if applied, amount to statistical discrimination if age was covered. With regard to disability, the concept of statistical discrimination as a form of direct discrimination does not seem to apply. Had it done so, the Trygg Hansa case described above would potentially have been decided differently.

A 2013 case followed the same line of reasoning. The Svea Court of Appeal found discrimination because the insurance company had denied insurance without assessing a child with a hearing impairment and giving enough consideration to the medical condition of this particular child. If the statistics are accurate enough with regard to the individual, statistical discrimination is not considered to be a form of direct discrimination with regard to insurance and disability.¹²⁹

All of this leads to the question of whether a country that extends the prohibition of discrimination to areas outside the directives is free to define the concept of direct discrimination more narrowly compared with the directive within those areas.¹³⁰

a) Distinction between goods and services available publicly or privately

In Sweden, national law distinguishes between goods and services that are available to the public (e.g. in shops, restaurants and banks) and those that are only available privately (e.g. those restricted to members of a private association).

¹²⁹ Svea Court of Appeal, Equality Ombudsman v If Insurances, case T 1912-13 (08.10.2013), at: <http://www.do.se/globalassets/diskrimineringsarenanden/hovratt/dom-hovratt-if-skadeforsakring-anm-20111922.pdf>.

¹³⁰ The European Court of Justice regards statistical discrimination as a form of direct discrimination. Case C-236/09 (Test Achats), where the insurance providers were not allowed to use the sex of the customer in order to determine insurance fees is a prime example. The fact that men statistically have more accidents than women is not a valid defence for directly using a person's sex to determine car insurance fees. However, with regard to disability and insurance, statistical differences between persons with a disability and persons without makes them not comparable, and thus a presumption of discrimination cannot arise. Note that the fact that the concept of direct discrimination covers statistical discrimination is so strong that the directive at issue (2004/113) contained a clause exempting the insurance sector, and it was this clause that got struck down by the CJEU. The Swedish Discrimination Act could have extended the protection for disability to services and then exempted the insurance sector, as in Directive 2004/113. However, extending the protection for disability to the insurance sector and then defining a comparable situation as if statistical discrimination is not a form of direct discrimination would have been confusing. If an EU concept such as direct discrimination is used, then it should (according to the author) be used correctly.

The Discrimination Act applies to:

'Persons who outside the private or family sphere are offering goods, services or housing to the public.'¹³¹

Directing an offer to the general public is a necessary requirement for the Discrimination Act to apply. A private person can sell or rent out anything without regard to the Discrimination Act, as long as the offer stays within a small group of people.

If an item is offered to the general public through a newspaper advertisement or on a sales website, it may be regarded as being outside of the private or family sphere. Selling a car or renting out a room can fall within the family sphere if it happens only occasionally. However, if someone rents out a room regularly and advertises it as soon as it is free, that may be regarded as falling within the public sphere. A private person's pursuit of an extra income may be considered to be within the public sphere.¹³²

3.2.9 Housing (Article 3(1)(h) Directive 2000/43)

In Sweden, the Discrimination Act prohibits discrimination in the area of housing, as formulated in the Racial Equality Directive. Chapter 2, Section 12 of the Discrimination Act prohibits discrimination in relation to the provision of goods, services and housing outside the sphere of private and family life. In addition to race, Section 12 applies to all of the grounds covered by the Act, including age, disability, religion or belief and sexual orientation.

The prohibition on housing discrimination covers all grounds but does not apply to private persons who sell or rent out their property 'on sporadic occasions'.

Housing falls under Chapter 2, Sections 12-12c of the Discrimination Act. The Government bill¹³³ to the Discrimination Act states that 'occasional instances'¹³⁴ (enstaka) of selling or renting out a dwelling should be regarded as being within the private/family sphere. Selling an apartment or a house will thus often be exempted from the law.¹³⁵ A realistic scenario is that an estate agent presents two possible buyers to the seller and the seller chooses the lower bid due to ethnic reasons. As long as it is the seller's decision and the estate agent treats both buyers equally, there is no unlawful discrimination under the act.

Situation testing in different forms has been undertaken by, among others, the Swedish Union of Tenants and researchers at Linnaeus University.¹³⁶ In 2007, when the researchers sent out 500 identical applications signed with a name indicating a Swedish female, she got to see the apartment in 20 % of cases. When the name signalled a Muslim man, only 4 % of the applications led to him being shown the apartment.¹³⁷ Neither example could lead to a discrimination case, since no physical person had suffered less favourable ¹³³ The Government bill is the document where the Government describes the new Act to the Parliament. If the Act is adopted as proposed – as was the case with the Discrimination Act – this bill becomes the most important source for interpreting the new act, at least before there is any case law. See the Introduction of this report.

¹³⁴ 'Sporadic occasions' may be more than one occasion. A person may, for instance, sell their apartment and buy a new one with a new partner, separate, sell the apartment and buy another apartment. As long as the apartments are bought and sold for housing reasons, and not commercial reasons, the sales are sporadic.

treatment (missgynnande). There was no one who could go to court or to the Ombudsman, and the researchers themselves had not been discriminated against.

The former Ombudsman against Ethnic Discrimination produced a major report in 2008 focusing on ethnic discrimination and housing. It was based on analyses of complaints and a series of exchanges with discriminated groups as well as those working in the field of housing. The report underlined discrimination issues in relation to both the acquisition of housing as well as living in housing. Among other recommendations, the report underlined the need for ongoing mutual learning exchange between the Ombudsman and discriminated groups, particularly since one problem is the lack of trust in Government agencies.¹³⁸

Although these discrimination studies are rather old, they have helped to dispel the idea of self-segregation as the primary problem. Research on housing segregation in relation to ethnicity and socio-economic factors over the years has indicated an increase in segregation. A 2014 study found discrimination to be an important factor.¹³⁹ At the same time, a recent study from 2019, while not directly looking at discrimination, concluded:

'The diversity gains – the influx of human capital, the reinforcement of innovative and entrepreneurial capacity, cultural enrichment, increased supply of less expensive services, etc. – primarily benefit those who are wealthy. The diversity burden – increased competition for jobs, wages and public healthcare, education and social care – are primarily borne by those who are poor. Immigration is, in other words, a redistributive policy that reinforces current inequalities in society.'¹⁴⁰

Although housing segregation studies do not necessarily provide an analysis of ethnic discrimination in housing, they provide some stimulus to the Government in relation to both segregation and discrimination in housing. This is indicated by the Government's long-term strategy to decrease and counteract segregation.¹⁴¹

In 2017, the Equality Ombudsman (DO) was given extra funding for a two-year period for an added focus on employment and housing discrimination. The Government's proposal for this work has a clear emphasis on educational and information efforts but says nothing about more effective or increased enforcement of the Discrimination Act in relation to employment and housing.¹⁴² The DO reported back on this work to the Government in 2018. Much of the focus seems to have been on analysis and information related to employment discrimination. In relation to the housing market, the DO notes that a decision has been made to focus its efforts on counteracting discrimination in the provision of rental apartments and in connection with the sale of housing. The one specific issue mentioned by the DO was that a legal analysis (rättsutredning) had been started with the purpose of clarifying the current state of the law concerning discrimination and housing sales to see, among other things, whether there were gaps in the protection against discrimination. The DO stated that, once completed, the legal analysis could be used to inform the Government about the need for additional regulation, as well as influencing the DO's work in relation to strategic litigation.¹⁴³ The legal analysis, completed in 2018, confirmed the preliminary indications that the Discrimination Act together with other laws covers most situations related to the sale of housing.¹⁴⁴

a) Trends and patterns regarding housing segregation for Roma

In Sweden, there are indications of housing segregation and discrimination against the Roma. There is no registration of people according to their ethnicity, which means that it is not necessarily easy to determine how the Roma population lives. When segregation is studied in statistical materials, a proxy such as the birthplace of the individual or of their parents can be used under certain circumstances. At the same time, this type of proxy provides no information concerning national ethnic minorities, such as the Roma.

The Swedish housing market is highly segregated in the three biggest cities. This segregation is mostly two-dimensional. Some areas are 'Swedish-dense'. In those areas, the Swedish ethnic majority is predominant. Other areas are 'Swedish-sparse'. The typical ethnic neighbourhood in Sweden has no dominant group. The municipal housing companies are often the largest in many areas. It may be assumed that the average Roma lives in such a neighbourhood. There have been some cases where local politicians have made discriminatory statements like 'Vänersborg cannot absorb more Gypsies'.¹⁴⁵ Similar comments have also been made by representatives of municipal housing companies.¹⁴⁶

Over the years, Roma people have brought a number of housing cases to the previous Ombudsman as well as to the Equality Ombudsman.¹⁴⁷ One example is the housing discrimination case on the DO's website that involved a 2013 settlement on behalf of a person perceived to be a Roma woman. She had signed the contract, paid a deposit, and received the key. The next day the landlord cancelled the contract, the reason being that the neighbours did not want her living there due to her Roma background. The settlement was for EUR 4 672 (SEK 50 000).¹⁴⁸

There is little to indicate that the situation has improved for Roma people. As part of the Government's Roma inclusion strategy 2012-2032, the National Board of Housing, Building and Planning was given the role of counteracting housing discrimination against Roma 2016-2018. As a part of this role, the board has developed web-based training focusing on the equal treatment of Roma in the housing market, aimed at landlords and property owners.¹⁴⁹ This also involved a consultation. The board's responsibility has been extended through 2020 and is to report back to the Government in March 2021.¹⁵⁰

The board developed a first overview report in 2014¹⁵¹ and a follow-up report in 2018.¹⁵² Some basic conclusions are that Roma experience discrimination in various parts of the housing process (finding housing, living in the housing and leaving housing). At the same time there is a strong reluctance to submit complaints. On the other hand, housing companies were basically of the opinion that discrimination against Roma did not occur. The board's main efforts have been directed towards developing and disseminating an educational programme on the equal treatment of Roma, directed towards public and private housing companies. Although the programme takes up the various relevant issues, according to the 2018 report, housing companies have shown a low level of interest. The board's education efforts concerning Roma and discrimination in housing continued throughout 2020.¹⁵³

In the opinion of the author of this report, it seems likely that the housing companies would show a greater interest in the education programme if they also saw a greater risk of enforcement of the Discrimination Act.

4 EXCEPTIONS

4.1 Genuine and determining occupational requirements (Article 4)

In Sweden, the Discrimination Act provides for an exception for genuine and determining occupational requirements.

Chapter 2, Section 2 of the Discrimination Act is formulated as follows:

'The Prohibition in Section 1 does not prevent ... differential treatment based on a characteristic associated with one of the grounds of discrimination if, when a decision is made on employment, promotion or education or training for promotion, by reason of the nature of the work or the context in which the work is carried out, the characteristic constitutes a genuine and determining occupational requirement that has a legitimate purpose and the requirement is appropriate and necessary to achieve that purpose.'

In the legislative preparatory works, it is made clear that typical examples concerning this clause include those where a Muslim organisation has the right to demand that an imam be of the Muslim faith, or an organisation campaigning for equal rights for gays and lesbians or an interest organisation serving a certain immigrant group may have a right to require that, for some 'core' positions, the employees themselves should be homosexuals or should have the relevant immigrant background. At the same time, it is emphasised that exceptions from the prohibition of discrimination must be given a narrow interpretation.¹⁵⁴ Concerning an organisation, only the positions that are 'visible' to the public or of particular relevance can come into question, not an entire organisation per se, and not automatically. The employer must, furthermore, have a strong motive for applying the exception, and the position must clearly have required the qualification concerned. Religious communities do not have a special status under the Discrimination Act, but they are explicitly mentioned in the legislative preparatory works, along with other examples.

4.2 Employers with an ethos based on religion or belief (Article 4(2) Directive 2000/78)

In Sweden, the Discrimination Act does not provide for an exception for employers with an ethos based on religion or belief.

In Sweden, all grounds of discrimination are in principle considered equal, and special provisions would violate this equality. The general rule on exceptions in the labour market in Chapter 2, Section 2 applies and there are thus no special exceptions for religious organisations/employers.

4.3 Armed forces and other specific occupations (Article 3(4) and Recitals 18 and 19, Directive 2000/78)

In Sweden, the Discrimination Act provides for an exception for the armed forces in relation to age but only with regard to conscription and military education under Chapter 2, Section 15 of the Discrimination Act, (Article 3(4), Directive 2000/78). An exception was needed for the ground of age discrimination due to the large variety of laws and regulations relating to age and service in the armed forces.¹⁵⁵ There is no exception in regard to disability.

¹⁵⁴ Government bill 2002/03:65, pp. 185-187 and Government bill 2007/08:95, pp. 155-157.

In Sweden, the scope of the exception is not explicitly limited to safeguarding the combat effectiveness of the armed forces. However, this is presumably the intention expressed in the Government bill concerning the exception for age.¹⁵⁶

In Sweden, the scope of the exception concerning age presumably does not extend to other non-combat staff, such as civilians employed in administrative positions in the army, since the focus of Chapter 2, Section 15 is on those doing compulsory military service or volunteering for military or civil service.

Chapter 2, Section 15, also covers enrolment procedures, admission tests and other examinations of personal circumstances under the National Total Defence Service Act (1994:1809). The act still applies, but nowadays the state does not force any person to do military service against their wishes. Conscription was reintroduced in 2018.¹⁵⁷

4.4 Nationality discrimination (Article 3(2))

a) Discrimination on the ground of nationality

In Sweden, national law includes exceptions relating to difference of treatment based on nationality.

In Sweden, nationality (as in citizenship) is not explicitly mentioned as a protected ground in national anti-discrimination law.

In Sweden, national origin is explicitly mentioned as part of the protected ground of ethnicity in national anti-discrimination law. Under Chapter 1, Section 5(3) of the Discrimination Act, ethnicity is defined as 'national or ethnic origin, skin colour or other similar circumstance'. Citizenship is thus not explicitly mentioned, but it falls under the definition of ethnicity, 'national origin or other similar circumstance'. The legislative materials state:

'Citizenship in itself is not covered by the discrimination ground ethnicity. Nevertheless, unjustified requirements concerning e.g. Swedish citizenship risk being determined to be indirect discrimination since such requirements typically are less favourable to persons with another ethnic or national origin than Swedish.'¹⁵⁸

Under Chapter 11, Section 11 of the Instrument of Government, Swedish citizenship is required for judges. Chapter 6, Section 2 says that Government ministers must have Swedish citizenship. The Chancellor of Justice, the Parliamentary Ombudsman and the three Auditors General are the other examples where Swedish nationality is required by Instrument of Government.¹⁵⁹

Positions to which the person is elected by the Parliament require Swedish citizenship, in accordance with Chapter 7, Section 11 of the Parliament Act (1974:153). This act has a semi-constitutional status. As regards other legislation, there are some (rare) occasions where Swedish citizenship is required.¹⁶⁰

¹⁵⁷ In March 2017, the Government decided to reintroduce conscription, starting in 2018. As only 4 000 out of a yearly cohort of 100 000 persons will serve and as their willingness to serve is a selection criterion, there is a strong possibility of it becoming a reality only for those who want to serve.

This Government inquiry included an inventory of the areas where citizenship requirements exist.

b) Relationship between nationality and 'racial or ethnic origin'

National origin and citizenship are two of many factors that can lie at the heart of ethnicity.¹⁶¹ The overlap is thus recognised by the law, and no person can be left unprotected. A stateless person will always have an ethnic/national origin. The word 'race' has been deliberately omitted. In Sweden, discrimination on this basis will be regarded as ethnic discrimination, being a ground similar to that of skin colour.¹⁶²

4.5 Health and safety (Article 7(2) Directive 2000/78)

In Sweden, there are no exceptions in relation to disability and health and safety, as allowed under Article 7(2) of the Employment Equality Directive.

The ordinary exception in Chapter 2, Section 2 of the Discrimination Act (genuine and determining occupational requirement) applies to the employer. Regarding persons with disabilities, it is relevant for the employer to take into consideration not only security issues and the health and safety of others at the workplace, but also the health and safety of the person with a disability. However, the burden of proof can sometimes be shifted to the employer, who then has to prove that the contested measure is necessary to protect health and safety.¹⁶³ In Labour Court case 2003 No. 47,¹⁶⁴ the risks of shift work for an employee with diabetes were not proven and the refusal to employ him was deemed to constitute direct discrimination.

4.6 Exceptions related to discrimination on the ground of age (Article 6 Directive 2000/78)

4.6.1 Direct discrimination

a) Exceptions to the prohibition of direct discrimination on grounds of age

In Sweden, the Discrimination Act provides for specific exceptions for direct discrimination on the ground of age. Chapter 2 Section 2(3) of the Discrimination Act allows age limits without the need to justify them with regard to the right to a pension or to survivor's benefits or disability benefits in individual contracts or collective agreements.

b) Justification of direct discrimination on the ground of age

In Sweden, the Discrimination Act provides for justifications for direct discrimination on the ground of age.

Chapter 2 Section 2(4) allows for:

'Differential treatment on grounds of age, if there is a legitimate purpose and the means that are used are appropriate and necessary to achieve that purpose'.

This test, as applied thus far, is in compliance with the test in Article 6 of Directive 2000/78.

¹⁶⁴ Labour Court 2003 No. 47, Swedish Metal Workers Union v Scandinavian Refinery Ltd (Scanraff) and Cooperative Employers Organisation.

There is thus a general possibility to justify age discrimination with a legitimate aim if the means are appropriate and necessary in pursuit of this aim. The legislative preparatory works for the Discrimination Act describe the scope for justification as being quite broad. Age limits are common in collective agreements, and the system as such works well according to the Government. Therefore, the courts are encouraged to look at a collective agreement in a holistic way, including its relationship to the relevant social security provisions, rather than singling out individual clauses in a collective agreement for scrutiny.¹⁶⁵ At the same time, the Government rejected demands for a presumption of collective agreements being compatible with Directive 2000/78.¹⁶⁶ Any benefit in a collective agreement can be seen as a 'certain advantage linked to employment' within the meaning of Article 6(1)(b) of the directive. In the author's opinion, the scope for justification is likely to become too broad unless the Labour Court makes a narrow interpretation of the law. Two examples from the legislative preparatory works concerning conditions fulfilling a legitimate aim and normally being both appropriate and necessary are that:¹⁶⁷

- better conditions regarding paid vacation are justified because older workers need more rest than younger workers in order to be able to work until they retire;
- better conditions regarding periods of notice for dismissals for older workers are also justified as an aid to help them work until retirement.

In a 2011 case,¹⁶⁸ the Labour Court made a narrow interpretation of the scope for different treatment with regard to age. The case concerned a redundancy situation regarding an airline's cabin crew personnel. According to the Employment Protection Act, the principle of seniority was to apply. Those persons who had been employed for the longest time were to have the highest level of job security. This rule is only semi-mandatory, however, and can thus be modified by collective agreements. A collective agreement in this case permitted the employer to dismiss all persons above the age of 60, as they were entitled to a full pension (roughly 70 % of previous pay) under the employer's pension scheme. The case concerned 25 persons.

The employer argued that there was no direct age discrimination. The company needed to reduce the workforce. Being dismissed was less hard on those who had a right to a full pension, therefore there were legitimate social reasons to choose those above the age of 60 for dismissal, and thus no indirect discrimination had occurred either.

The Labour Court decided that there was direct discrimination because age and the pension rights were directly linked to each other. The Labour Court said that both the desire to distribute employment fairly between generations and the desire to ensure that the remaining employees were not all close to pension age were arguments that could be valid in defending different treatment according to age under Chapter 2, Section 2(4) of the Discrimination Act. Voluntary retirement schemes could thus be acceptable. However, it was not deemed proportionate, given the circumstances of the case, to force retirement on all those who had reached the age of 60.

The dismissals were declared void. The 25 persons thus kept their employment and were each awarded EUR 11 700 (SEK 125 000) to be paid by the employer in a combination of a discrimination compensation award and non-pecuniary damages under the Employment Protection Act (Lagen om anställningsskydd).¹⁶⁹

¹⁶⁹ The reform of 2013 extending the protection for age discrimination did not affect the prohibition of discrimination in the labour market.

So far, the interpretation seems to be in conformity with the directive as far as discrimination against older persons is concerned.

c) Permitted differences of treatment based on age

In Sweden, national law permits differences of treatment based on age for activities within the material scope of Directive 2000/78.

According to Chapter 2 Section 2(3), the prohibition against discrimination in working life does not prevent 'the application of age limits with regard to the right to pension, survivor's or invalidity benefits in individual contracts or collective agreements'.

The general exception in Chapter 2 Section 2(4) of the Discrimination Act will allow any differential treatment that passes the proportionality test. The prohibition does not prevent 'differential treatment on grounds of age, if there is a legitimate purpose and the means that are used are appropriate and necessary to achieve that purpose.'

d) Fixing of ages for admission to occupational pension schemes

In Sweden, national law allows occupational pension schemes to fix ages for admission to the scheme, taking up the possibility provided for by Article 6(2).

There is a specific exception in the Discrimination Act for age limits concerning pensions, survivor's benefits and disability benefits, in individual contracts and collective agreements.¹⁷⁰ In the view of the author of this report, the wording of this exception means that the Act allows for the use of age criteria in actuarial calculations concerning the benefits mentioned.

4.6.2 Special conditions for younger or older workers

In Sweden, there are special conditions set by law for older and younger workers in order to promote their vocational integration.

Within labour market policy regulations there are a number of rules which expressly refer to age, aimed at promoting the vocational integration of young and old people, respectively. Age limits are often uncontroversial. There is, for instance, a 'work guarantee' for people younger than 25. It was introduced as an amendment to the Regulation on a work guarantee for young persons and has the aim of ensuring that a young person gets a suitable place in an education programme or traineeship within three months of registering with the National Employment Agency.¹⁷¹

4.6.3 Minimum and maximum age requirements

In Sweden, there are no exceptions permitting minimum and/or maximum age requirements in relation to access to employment and training, except in relation to the military.

Minimum or maximum age requirements are dealt with under the proportionality test in Chapter 2, Section 2(4) of the Discrimination Act (see Section 4.6.1.b above).

¹⁷⁰ Discrimination Act (2008:567) Chapter 2, Section 2(3).

¹⁷¹ Regulation (2007:813) on a work guarantee for young persons, (updated by SFS 2017:1165). The words 'work guarantee' have been put inside quotation marks because the act contains goals and not a legally enforceable guarantee.

4.6.4 Retirement

a) State pension age

In Sweden, there is no state pension age at which individuals must begin to collect their state pensions.

If an individual wishes to work beyond the state pension age, the pension can be deferred. Here the term 'state pension age' means the age at which a person can start to collect her or his pension. If a person wishes to work, the pension can be postponed without any upper limit, with each month of postponement resulting in an actuarial increase of the pension level.

An individual can collect a pension and still work.

According to the Swedish statutory pension scheme introduced in 1998,¹⁷² there is no fixed upper pension age. The income-related public pension scheme opens up for part-time or full-time pensions from the age of 62.

People may also postpone their pensions, continue to work for as long as they like and continue to add to their pension benefits, the scheme being based on a principle of lifelong earnings and actuarially correct calculations based on their expected remaining lifetime when they take out the pension. Postponing the pension payments for one month raises the pension by approximately 0.6 % around the age of 65. It is possible to collect a pension and still work – both the pension and the income are taxable.

However, the right to the basic pension scheme – the 'guaranteed pension' – requires the beneficiary to be 65 years of age.¹⁷³

b) Occupational pension schemes

In Sweden, there is no standard age when people can begin to receive payments from occupational pension schemes and other employer-funded pension arrangements.

If an individual wishes to work for longer, payments from such occupational pension schemes can often be deferred.

In most cases, an individual cannot collect an occupational pension and still work full-time for their employer.

There are over 300 occupational pension schemes in Sweden.

Generally speaking, occupational pension schemes contain (mostly flexible) rules on the pensionable age. Pensions can thus normally be deferred if an individual wishes to work for longer, and the scheme will provide more pension income in such cases.¹⁷⁴ The age of 55 is the earliest age at which a pension fund can allow a person to start withdrawing their pension.¹⁷⁵ Many occupational pension schemes thus have this age limit; 60 and 65 are other common age limits.

¹⁷² Social Security Code (Socialförsäkringsbalk) (2010:110), adopted on 04.03.2010, Chapters 62-67.

¹⁷⁴ Collective agreements on pensions are very diverse. The normal practice today is that a young person belongs to a prefunded system based on actuarial principles. Elderly workers quite often belong to a defined benefits system, and some systems have a combination of a defined contribution with guaranteed defined benefits for those with many years of participation. Such systems do not always work on actuarial principles (with regard to the defined benefit part) if the worker decides to postpone their retirement.

It is not uncommon for occupational pension schemes to be related to retirement, and thus it is not possible for a person who keeps working full-time for the same employer to claim a pension as well.

c) State imposed mandatory retirement ages

In Sweden, there is no state-imposed mandatory retirement age.

d) Retirement ages imposed by employers

In Sweden, national law permits employers to set the retirement age at 68 years as from 2020 and 69 years as from 2023¹⁷⁶ by contract, collective bargaining or unilaterally.

Within employment law there is a right for the employee to stay on until he or she reaches the age of 68 years as from 2020 and 69 years as from 2023, despite what may have been agreed between the parties.¹⁷⁷ At this point it is possible for the employer to unilaterally terminate the employment with one month's notice. This principle was accepted by the CJEU in the Hörnfeldt case.¹⁷⁸ On a general level, most Swedes accumulate a viable pension by the age of 67. This general age limit is therefore proportional and can be defended as an integral part of the general labour market system.

However, in the Keolis case,¹⁷⁹ the employer legally dismissed bus drivers at the age of 67. The employer then offered to re-hire the staff on a fixed short-term hourly basis (for instance filling in at short notice for permanently employed drivers calling in sick). When they reached the age of 70, their employment was not renewed. This was considered to be direct age discrimination. The Labour Court stated that the permission to dismiss with regard to the Discrimination Act (or to refuse to prolong temporary employment) without an individual assessment exists only at the age of 67. Only at this age is there explicit permission in the Employment Protection Act for dismissals without just cause.¹⁸⁰

e) Employment rights applicable to all workers irrespective of age

The law on protection against dismissal and other laws protecting employment rights do not apply in the same way to all workers irrespective of age if they remain in employment on attaining pensionable age or another age.

The 1982 Swedish Employment Protection Act differentiates between dismissal on personal grounds (which requires just cause) and dismissal due to a shortage of work for business reasons.

In the latter case, just cause is considered to exist (the decision as to whether there is a shortage of work rests entirely with the employer), but lay-offs have to be carried out in ¹⁷⁵ Income Tax Act (Inkomstskattelag) (1999:1229) adopted on 16.12.1999, Chapter 58 Section 8 sets this age as the lowest possible for favourable tax treatment.

¹⁷⁶ Pensions Agency at: <https://www.pensionsmyndigheten.se/ga-i-pension/planera-din-pension/hojd-pensionsalder>.

¹⁷⁸ Judgment of 5 July 2012, Torsten Hörnfeldt v Posten AB, Case C-141/11, EU:C:2012:421.

¹⁷⁹ Labour Court 2015 No. 51, Equality Ombudsman v Keolis AB (16.09.2015).

¹⁸⁰ The age of 67 applied previously. According to the Employment Protection Act, as amended on 18 June 2019, an employee has the right to keep working until the age of 68 from 2020 and to the age of 69 from 2023. There is a free choice on fixed-term contracts once the worker is 68 or 69 respectively or older. However, the Discrimination Act still applies to any refusal to prolong employment that may involve discrimination.

accordance with the last-in, first-out principle under Section 22 of the Employment Protection Act. Regardless of the reason for the dismissal, the notice period (between one to six months) required relates to the prior period of employment and is thus indirectly related to age.

At the age of 68 as from 2020 and 69 as from 2023, the worker loses the right to seniority under Section 33 of the Employment Protection Act and can thus be dismissed in a redundancy case. The same section also gives the employer the right to dismiss the worker with one month's notice at this age. Should the employer not do this, the old employee cannot be dismissed for personal reasons without just cause any more, but presumably the protection will be much weaker. There is no case law on this. Previously, employers normally dismissed workers who had reached the age of 67 years. If they want to keep the worker, they give the worker a fixed-term contract - on which there is no restriction if the worker is 68 years or older, in accordance with Section 5(4) of the Employment Protection Act.¹⁸¹ The fact that the Discrimination Act could be applicable to the refusal to renew such a contract at an age significantly above 67 - as was decided in the Keolis case¹⁸² - was a surprise to many people.

f) Compliance of national law with CJEU case law

In Sweden, the national legislation is in line with CJEU case law on age regarding mandatory retirement.

4.6.5 Redundancy

a) Age and seniority taken into account for redundancy selection

In Sweden, national law permits and requires seniority to be taken into account in selecting workers for redundancy.

The Swedish 1982 Employment Protection Act differentiates between dismissal on personal grounds (which requires just cause) and dismissal due to a shortage of work.

In the latter case, just cause is regarded to exist (the decision as to whether there is a shortage of work rests entirely with the employer), but lay-offs have to be carried out in accordance with the last-in, first-out principle under Section 22.

Moreover, in the event of equal periods of employment, senior age priority applies directly. There is also special protection for persons with disabilities (preference, i.e. the seniority rule, does not necessarily apply).

Regardless of the reason for the dismissal, the notice period (between one and six months) required relates to the prior period of employment and is thus indirectly related to age.

Redundancies and collective agreements are problematic in Sweden. It is not unusual for central collective agreements to give people over the age of 60 access to early retirement if there is a redundancy situation. Such arrangements encourage the local trade union to agree to local collective agreements allowing elderly workers to be dismissed in redundancy situations instead of applying the last-in, first-out principle. If all those over the age of 60 are dismissed, it becomes a case of direct discrimination, which is prohibited. However, if 50 % of the employees over 60 whose preference was to work until early retirement are dismissed and 25 % of the younger workers are dismissed, it would become a case of possible indirect discrimination and, since collective agreements have strong standing in the Swedish labour market model, they would probably survive a proportionality test.

Facilitating the dismissals of elderly persons through local collective agreements seems to be an important reason for employers to want central collective agreements providing early retirement for workers over 60 who are made redundant.

b) Age taken into account for redundancy compensation

In Sweden, national law does not provide compensation for redundancy.

Collective agreements for white-collar workers and for workers in the public/state sector sometimes provide packages including extra unemployment benefits, re-training on favourable terms and even early retirement if the worker who is being made redundant is over 60.¹⁸³

4.7 Public security, public order, criminal offences, protection of health, protection of the rights and freedoms of others (Article 2(5) Directive 2000/78)

In Sweden, national law does not include exceptions that seek to rely on Article 2(5) of the Employment Equality Directive.

4.8 Any other exceptions

In Sweden, other exceptions to the prohibition of discrimination (on any ground covered by this report) provided in national law are the following:

- Age limits set by law are accepted within the social security field under Chapter 2, Section 14b (1) of the Discrimination Act.
- Age limits set in laws for goods and services are permitted under Chapter 2, Section 12b (1) of the Discrimination Act.
- Age limits in the insurance sector are permitted under Chapter 2, Section 12b (2) of the Discrimination Act.
- Minimum age limits for places that are allowed to serve alcohol are permitted under Chapter 2, Section 12b (3) of the Discrimination Act.
- Age limits set in laws governing healthcare and social services are also permitted under Chapter 2, Section 13b (1) of the Discrimination Act.
- Discrimination in the form of inadequate accessibility does not apply to housing under Chapter 2, Section 12c (1) of the Discrimination Act.
- Inadequate accessibility as a form of discrimination does not apply to private persons under Chapter 2, Section 12c (2) of the Discrimination Act.
- A seller of goods or provider of services who has fulfilled the accessibility requirements in the building regulations at the time the premises were built cannot be required to undertake any further accessibility measures. This is stated in Chapter 2, Section 12c (4) of the Discrimination Act.
- According to Chapter 2, Section 15 of the Discrimination Act, a specific exception is made for discrimination due to age concerning the prohibition of discrimination in relation to enrolment procedures, enlistment for and the performance of national military or civilian service and admission examinations for and during the performance of other equivalent military training.
- According to Chapter 2, Section 16 of the Discrimination Act, a specific exception is made for discrimination due to age concerning the obligation by the military or other organisations referred to in Chapter 2, Section 15 to investigate and take measures against harassment and sexual harassment. If they are employed by the military, the normal rules apply.

¹⁸³ See further descriptions and discussions of such collective agreements in relation to the sustainability of the Swedish pension system in Government White Paper SOU 2012:28, pp. 316-320.

5 POSITIVE ACTION (Article 5 Directive 2000/43, Article 7 Directive 2000/78)

a) Scope for positive action measures

In Sweden, the extent to which positive action is specifically allowed by the Discrimination Act depends on the ground (racial or ethnic origin, religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation) and the area of prohibition. There is no general clause allowing positive action.

In working life, there is a clause that allows for positive action only in relation to sex (Chapter 2, Section 2(2)). In particular, even though it was proposed by the relevant Government inquiry, the Government made it clear in the bill proposing the current Discrimination Act that positive action in working life concerning ethnicity was not to be allowed.¹⁸⁴

Positive action in relation to sex is also allowed more broadly in relation to other areas in Chapter 2 of the Discrimination Act such as education (Section 6(1)), labour market policy activities (Section 9(1)), starting or running a business (Section 10), membership of certain organisations (Section 11), and goods, services and housing (Section 12a). Positive action concerning ethnicity, religion or other belief in relation to education is allowed only concerning 'a folk high school or a study association' (Section 6, para 2). In relation to Sections 9, 10 and 11, positive action concerning ethnicity is essentially allowed to the same extent that it is allowed in relation to sex. Otherwise, positive action is not mentioned in the Act in relation to the other grounds.

While not specified in the Discrimination Act, positive action in relation to persons with disabilities is generally allowed due to the asymmetric nature of the prohibition against discrimination. Measures benefiting this group may disfavour persons with no disabilities, but that group is not protected by the Discrimination Act and thus the discrimination is presumably lawful. The protection provided for disability is 'asymmetric' as compared with, for example, the protection for ethnicity, which protects 'Swedes' and 'non-Swedes', the protection for the ground of sex, which protects men and women, and the protection for sexual orientation, which protects heterosexuals, homosexuals and bisexuals.

In other areas of labour law as well as labour market policy regulations, a number of special measures are available in relation to persons with disabilities with regard to their working life. Their purpose is to directly or indirectly compensate for disadvantages linked to disability. In some cases, for example, wage subsidies are available. An individual may also have a right to certain support measures in order to regain or retain his/her work capacity. These measures are regulated in the Social Insurance Code (Socialförsäkringsbalk, 2010:110) Chapters 29-31. Employers are required to maintain a good work environment, which means not only the physical aspects but the psycho-social aspects as well. This also means that certain types of accommodation should be made for employees with disabilities. This can relate to the physical accessibility of the workplace. These issues are regulated in the Work Environment Act (Arbetsmiljölagen, 1977:1160) and the Work Environment Regulation (Arbetsmiljöförordningen, 1977:1166), as well as by the Discrimination Act.

With regard to age, direct discrimination can, in almost all areas, be justified by a proportionality test. Positive action measures would normally pass such a test.

A right for members of certain religions to refuse military service is also specified (Chapter 2, Section 15).

There are no exceptions in the act concerning sexual orientation.

¹⁸⁴ Government bill 2007/08:95 p. 161-171.

The Discrimination Act also contains rules on 'active' measures. From an EU legal perspective, such measures are within the realm of positive action in a more general sense. The act requires that employers continuously carry out goal-oriented work concerning all discrimination grounds so as to actively promote equality in working life.¹⁸⁵ Education providers are also required to undertake continuous goal-oriented work with regard to all grounds (Chapter 3, Sections 1-3).

Both employers and education providers need to have a ready-made procedure in place to handle instances of sexual harassment and other harassment on any ground that may be reported by students/pupils/employees (Chapter 3, Sections 6 and 18).¹⁸⁶

b) Quotas in employment for people with disabilities

In Sweden, national law does not provide for quotas for the employment of people with disabilities.

¹⁸⁵ Discrimination Act (2008:567), Chapter 3 Sections 1-3.

¹⁸⁶ With regard to employers, this duty includes victimisation too. As regards active measures, the Ombudsman works as a regulatory authority, visiting employers and universities, checking their equality plans and so on. If somebody fails to fulfil their duties, the Board Against Discrimination may – on the Ombudsman's application – issue an order to comply with a specific request before a certain date (or in the future), subject to a financial penalty under Chapter 4, Section 5 of the Discrimination Act. The financial penalty will gain legal force only after a district court has ordered the payment. The legality of the order itself – as well as the reasonableness of the amount – can be decided upon by the district court. As far as the author knows, a district court has never ordered such a payment, and applications to the Board Against Discrimination have been extremely rare.

6 REMEDIES AND ENFORCEMENT

6.1 Judicial and/or administrative procedures (Article 7 Directive 2000/43, Article 9 Directive 2000/78)

- a) Available procedures for enforcing the principle of equal treatment
- Judicial proceedings in the Labour Court (starting in the district court if the worker is represented by someone other than a trade union with a collective agreement or by the Equality Ombudsman).
 - Judicial proceedings in the general court system, primarily concerning discrimination outside of the field of working life.
 - If a trade union with a collective agreement represents a member, there must be negotiations with a view to settling the conflict, which must take place before going to the Labour Court, according to Section 11 of the Co-Determination Act in conjunction with Chapter 4, Section 7 of the Labour Procedure Act (1974:371). Cases are often settled at this stage.
 - The Equality Ombudsman negotiates with the employer before going to the Labour Court.¹⁸⁷
 - Criminal complaints related to Penal Code 16:9 concerning unlawful discrimination can be submitted to the police for prosecution.

As a general rule, the administrative courts and procedures are not used to address discrimination under the Discrimination Act.¹⁸⁸ No administrative body can apply the Discrimination Act directly. However, there are some situations where a discriminatory situation can be resolved by an administrative body and through the application of other laws and regulations. If, for instance, a parent gets a decision from the School Appeal Board concluding that the accommodation costs necessary for accepting their child to a school are not substantial,¹⁸⁹ the school must take on those costs. This means that the discrimination issue has been resolved, but at the same time the decision does not lead to an award of discrimination compensation. Some state employment decisions, due to rules in the Instrument of Government (Constitution) concerning objective grounds on hiring, can be appealed through administrative proceedings.¹⁹⁰ If the claimant is better qualified, he or she is entitled to the job, but not a discrimination compensation award. Under the Discrimination Act, a court can only grant a discrimination compensation award but not the job. Thus, using these administrative procedures is sometimes an alternative or complementary way to appeal against a discriminatory decision.

Along the same lines, on 1 July 2017 a mechanism was introduced in the education sector to bring an alleged violation of the Discrimination Act to the Higher Education Appeal Board in some situations. However, this does not include any possibility of obtaining a discrimination award; it is only possible to correct the discriminatory act or omission, for instance by replacing a tutor who has discriminated against a student.¹⁹¹

Relevant criminal procedures may be initiated by a public prosecutor (or in very rare cases by the private party). The Ombudsman does not have legal standing before the courts in criminal procedures.

¹⁸⁷ The law does not require this but having the Labour Court as the only instance presupposes well-prepared cases, and that includes these negotiations. Chapter 4, Section 3 of the Discrimination Act gives the Equality Ombudsman the power to issue an order subject to a financial penalty (which can be appealed to the Board against Discrimination) if the employer does not show up.

¹⁸⁸ However, see the three administrative court cases described in Section 12.2.

¹⁹⁰ Instrument of Government, Chapter 12, Art. 5 (2): 'When making appointments to posts within the State administration, only objective factors, such as merit and competence, shall be taken into account.'

¹⁹¹ Act (2017:282) changing the Discrimination Act.

In the Labour Court, a trade union or the Equality Ombudsman can act on behalf of the worker; in the general court system, the Equality Ombudsman can act on behalf of the claimant.

One of the tasks of the Ombudsman is to investigate complaints of discrimination. This includes the provision of advice, but also – at the Ombudsman’s discretion – of representing the victim of discrimination in settlement proceedings or, ultimately, in a court of law. Should the individual concerned be a member of a trade union, the right of the Ombudsman is subsidiary to the right of the trade union to represent its member.

Civil proceedings regarding working life under the Discrimination Act are to be dealt with in accordance with the Labour Disputes Act.¹⁹² Depending on whether the employer is bound by a collective agreement, whether the person who alleges discrimination is or is not a member of the trade union with the collective agreement, and whether the trade union is willing to take up the claim, the case may be heard in the first instance either by the district court (tingsrätt) with ordinary judges as in other civil cases, or the Labour Court (Arbetsdomstolen), in a special composition comprised of a majority of judges with a judicial background and a minority of members with a background in labour market organisations.¹⁹³

Whereas it is the injured individual (or an NGO) who has standing (locus standi) as the claimant at the district court, it is the trade union that takes that position when claims are dealt with at the Labour Court as the first (and last) instance. A lawsuit taken to the district court in accordance with the described rules may always be appealed to the Labour Court, whereas a decision of the Labour Court – whether as the first or second instance – is not subject to further appeal. As already indicated, the Ombudsman can also bring a case directly to the Labour Court. When the DO takes on a claimant’s case and the claimant provides a power of attorney, the DO becomes the named party in the case.

The Equality Ombudsman may represent victims of discrimination in all areas covered by the Discrimination Act. Cases outside working life will be dealt with by the ordinary court system, i.e. the relevant district court in the first instance. Discrimination in connection with social security, for instance, (an example of an area that normally falls under administrative law) is thus dealt with under the general court system, and the ordinary rules on civil procedure apply.¹⁹⁴

The relatively few cases that end up in the court system should not be taken as proof that action is not taken in cases of discrimination. A number of cases are presumably settled out of court. The same is probably true concerning the trade unions. Most complaints are settled during the mandatory negotiations prior to a claim being presented to the Labour Court. In cases that are settled, the remedies are pretty much the same as those that apply in the case law of the Labour Court. At times though, a settlement can involve better results, since settlements are not necessarily limited to economic compensation. For example, a settlement can include compensation combined with employment, which is something a court could not order. Legal costs can also be reduced through settlements.

b) Barriers and other deterrents faced by litigants seeking redress

With regard to discrimination cases, inside as well as outside the labour market, there are various obstacles for potential discrimination litigants, such as low levels of rights awareness, low levels of trust in the legal system, low levels of experience with lawyers and the legal system and limited awards if successful. These factors tend to complement ¹⁹² Act (1974:371) on Labour Law Procedure.

¹⁹⁴ Some university or higher education cases may also be brought before the Board of Appeal for Higher Education.

what is presumably the most important deterrent: the huge economic risk related to litigation, particularly given the 'loser pays' rules. Potential litigants seldom have the resources to be able to risk paying EUR 10 000 – 20 000 or more for the other party's legal costs if they lose, which is the general rule. This is on top of their own costs for a lawyer. At the same time, those with the power to discriminate, such as employers, business owners and Government agencies, generally have a natural advantage due to their economic position as well as familiarity and experience with the legal system and access to expertise. Furthermore, the costs for legal services for those accused of discrimination are generally considered to be normal business expenses.

If the claimant asks for less than EUR 2 060 (SEK 22 000), a simplified small claims procedure may be used. In theory, the small claims procedure is based on the idea that a claimant does not need an attorney. The right of the winning party to recover legal costs is limited to only minor costs in small claims cases.¹⁹⁵ This is why anti-discrimination bureaux and other NGOs tend to file their cases as small claims cases.

Individuals have the option of using private attorneys, but given the loser-pays system, they are naturally hesitant, and there are presumably few attorneys who are willing to take on such cases. There is thus little chance that individuals will go to court except in those limited cases where the DO (or a union or other NGO) agrees to provide representation. Thus, for most people, the willingness of the DO (or a union or other NGO) to represent victims is very important. When the DO or a trade union or another NGO takes on a case, it is as the named party, which also means that they are taking on the economic risk of losing the case.

These issues can be illustrated by examining the limited number of cases for 2020 as described in Section 12.2 below. They provide some indications of the barriers faced by litigants. In the cases heard in the Labour Court and the ordinary courts (district courts or appeal courts) where the DO or a union represented the person who claimed they had been discriminated against, the unions and the DO, when losing the case were ordered to pay about EUR 9 000 to EUR 20 000.¹⁹⁶ In the two Labour Court cases filed by individuals on appeal from a district court decision, the individuals were required to pay more than EUR 20 000 in legal costs when they lost.¹⁹⁷

Another result of the loser-pays rules can be seen in the four cases filed by or supported by NGOs. Each of those cases was filed as a small claims case.¹⁹⁸ While limiting the cost risks involved, as well as the potential discrimination compensation, they were at least able to bring important test cases to court on behalf of the individuals involved as well as others that could potentially benefit.

In discrimination cases taken to the courts by individuals (usually non-employment cases), it is possible for a court to rule that both parties will bear their own costs, in accordance with Chapter 6, Section 7 of the Discrimination Act, if the individual claimant loses but had good reason (skälig anledning) for taking the case to court.¹⁹⁹ The rule is designed to

¹⁹⁷ See S.K.H. v Södersjukhuset Aktieföretag and T.H. v Staten genom Domstolsverket (State through the Swedish National Courts Administration).

¹⁹⁸ See Section 12.2 below: Malmö stad v Malmö mot Diskriminering (MMD), SL v Huddinge Municipality, LK v Malmö Municipality and Örebro Municipality v HD.

¹⁹⁹ The Equality Ombudsman cannot use this rule. It only applies to private persons. An anti-discrimination bureau, as a legal person under private law, would be able to use it. See, for instance, Skåne and Blekinge Court of Appeal, case FT 1948-12, Forum for Equal Rights v IKEA (18.03.2013). An anti-discrimination bureau helped a mother to sue IKEA for not letting her disabled daughter play in the playroom. She demanded EUR 2 200 (SEK 20 000) as a discrimination award. IKEA admitted that it had treated her daughter badly. IKEA accepted SEK 20 000 as fair compensation but did not admit to discrimination. The encourage individuals with good faith claims. In the author's opinion, individuals and NGOs seldom attempt to use this possibility as there is little clarity about how the courts will apply this exception to the loser-pays rule. Rather than addressing what is an important issue concerning access to justice, the courts, particularly the Labour Court, seem to be more concerned about ensuring a restrictive application of this exception to the general rule. In a 2015 case, the district court determined that the claimant had good reason to bring his case, so in spite of losing, ruled that both parties should bear their own costs. On appeal, the Labour Court disregarded the trial court's analysis and ordered the losing claimant to pay the winning party's legal costs in the amount of EUR 156 322 (SEK 1 663 400).²⁰⁰

The labour market litigation rules are based on an assumption that the worker is represented by his or her trade union. If the union does not represent the worker, or if the worker is not a union member, the time limits can be a real barrier when it comes to access to justice.

If a person has very limited (or no) financial resources and is not represented by the DO or a trade union, it is possible to ask for legal aid under certain limited circumstances in employment cases to help with the costs of going to court. In certain limited cases legal insurance may be available as well.

Obviously, the economic risks for most individuals in such cases are quite high and/or too high, while at the same time the potential compensation is relatively low. Those bodies that have the economic means to take cases to court, the DO and the unions, generally seem unwilling to do so. At the same time, those with very limited means, individuals and NGOs seem to be developing at least some means to test the law in the courts. They rely on the small claims procedure, their limited resources and the pro bono work of lawyers and others.

In the author's opinion, this means that few individuals are willing to enforce their rights even if they have very good cases. The low number of cases in 2020 is a clear indication of the issue. At a societal level, this also means that the Discrimination Act, due to a lack of a critical mass of cases and case law, will have only limited effects in changing social norms. This is presumably a key goal of the Discrimination Act as well as the EU's anti-discrimination directives. If the legislature wants to achieve greater access to justice for individuals as well as increased effectiveness of the Discrimination Act, the courts need greater guidance concerning the distribution of costs. One possibility would be a binding decision at the preliminary stage of a case concerning good faith, relieving the individual's risks concerning legal costs.²⁰¹ Another would be the establishment of an NGO-run test case fund similar to the Canadian Court Challenges Program.²⁰² These are potential ways to contribute to the long-term goal of equality as a fundamental human right.

As regards the general time limit under the Discrimination Act, a claim must be presented within two years of when the alleged discriminatory act took place.²⁰³ The procedures are the same regardless of whether the case concerns the private sector or the public sector.

case was tried by both the district court and the appeal court because the classification of the decision as discrimination or otherwise was important to both parties.

At the same time, a complex system of rather short time limits applies in relation to working life.²⁰⁴ Dismissal claims are regulated by the 1982 Employment Protection Act, which also sets out the applicable time limits. If the claim seeks to declare a dismissal null and void, the procedure must take place within weeks from the occurrence of the act or – in certain cases – one month after the end of the employment. If the claim concerns only indemnification, the employer must be notified within four months. The 1976 Co-Determination Act applies to cases concerning wage compensation. Here, the general time limit is four months from gaining knowledge of the act, with a maximum of two years from its occurrence.²⁰⁵ Within these time limits, it is possible to bring a discrimination suit after the employment relationship has ended.

c) Number of discrimination cases brought to justice

In Sweden, statistics on the number of cases related to discrimination brought to justice are not available.

The direct overall statistics are not readily available, although some information is accessible. In the Labour Court, there were five judgments concerning discrimination in 2020 and none in 2019. The 2020 case brought by the DO concerned parental leave and sex discrimination. Two of the cases were brought by a union and two of the cases were brought by individuals on appeal from a district court. All four of those cases involved the issue of a disability.²⁰⁶

In addition to the DO's Labour Court case concerning parental leave and sex discrimination mentioned above, the DO had two cases decided in the ordinary courts in 2020. In March 2020, the Göta Appeal Court overturned a 2019 Linköping District Court judgment in favour of a Roma family concerning ethnic discrimination by toy store personnel. The appeal court determined that there was insufficient evidence concerning the connection to ethnicity.²⁰⁷ In addition, the DO lost a case in the district court concerning inadequate accessibility in relation to a wheelchair user who, on several occasions, was not allowed to board a bus. The court accepted the explanation that the buses were adapted to provide accommodation but that the bus drivers had nevertheless made decisions based on safety concerns due to the estimated weight of the wheelchair. The DO has applied for approval of an appeal.²⁰⁸

In 2020, the Skåne and Blekinge Appeal Court confirmed the decision of a district court holding that a pupil in Malmö was subjected to discrimination in the form of inadequate accessibility due to the delays in the process of dealing with the pupil's educational needs.²⁰⁹

²⁰⁴ Discrimination Act (2008:567), Chapter 6, Sections 4 and 5.

²⁰⁵ If someone brings an action as a result of a notice of termination or summary dismissal, the rules in the 1982 Employment Protection Act (LAS) apply. To have a dismissal declared null and void, the employer must be notified about the claim within two weeks of the dismissal. A lawsuit must be presented within two weeks thereafter or, if conciliation negotiations have taken place, within two weeks of the termination of such negotiations (Section 40 LAS). As regards damage claims, the employer will be notified about the claim within four months after the damaging activity occurred, and a lawsuit must be presented within four months after that or, should conciliation negotiations have taken place, within four months of terminating such negotiations (Section 41 LAS). With regard to any other action, the rules in the Co-Determination Act (MBL) apply. Conciliation negotiations must be demanded by the relevant trade union within four months of becoming aware of the damaging act and within two years of the act itself (Section 64 MBL). A lawsuit must be presented within three months after terminating such negotiations (Section 65). If an employee cannot be represented by a trade union, he or she must present the claim to the court within four months of becoming aware of the damaging act and within two years of the act itself (Section 66 MBL).

²⁰⁹ See Section 2.6e and Section 12.2: Malmö stad v Malmö mot Diskriminering (MMD).

There were also three strategic disability litigation cases that reached the appeal courts in 2020 concerning the assertion that discrimination against pupils with dyslexia occurs when the pupils are not allowed to use their assistance devices when taking national tests – devices that they are otherwise allowed to use in their schoolwork. Three separate appeal courts determined that there was no violation of the Discrimination Act and the Supreme Court denied the application for leave to appeal.²¹⁰

Three of the cases in Section 12.2 come from the administrative courts. One involves a city council decision to ban prayer by city employees during working hours. The other two involve banning the use of headscarves, niqabs and burqas in the city’s preschools and schools. Due to a special procedure that allows for citizen appeals of the decisions to the administrative courts, the courts can examine the legality of city council decisions. The courts held that these decisions violated the right to freedom of religion in the Swedish constitution and the European Convention on Human Rights.²¹¹

Finally, there is the UN CRPD Committee opinion criticising Sweden’s failure to properly implement reasonable accommodation concerning a 2017 Swedish case where a disabled person applied for a university lecturer’s position.²¹² This opinion provides some guidance on the implementation of reasonable accommodation in Sweden as well as other States that have ratified the CRPD.

d) Registration of national court decisions on discrimination

In Sweden, court decisions on discrimination are not registered as such by national courts.

6.2 Legal standing and associations (Article 7(2) Directive 2000/43, Article 9(2) Directive 2000/78)

a) Engaging in proceedings on behalf of victims of discrimination (representing them)

In Sweden, the trade unions, the Equality Ombudsman and non-profit organisations are entitled to act on behalf of victims of discrimination. They can all become the named party, with the permission of the claimant, which means they also take on the economic risks and would have to pay the opposing party’s legal costs if they lose the case.

Labour unions have legal standing to litigate discrimination cases where one of their members is involved in accordance with Chapter 4, Section 5 of the Labour Procedure Act. The Equality Ombudsman can also act on behalf of a claimant. The right of the Equality Ombudsman to represent a victim is subsidiary to a labour union’s right to represent its members under Chapter 6 Section 2(3) of the Discrimination Act.

The unions have their own experienced negotiators and lawyers. Two of the larger union confederations even have their own specialised law firm – LO-TCO Rättsskydd AB. While unions have priority concerning the right to represent members, members do not have a right to demand representation. There can be situations where the union does not want to deal with a member’s legal problems due to its understanding of the cases as well as conflicting interests that a union may have ranging from conflicts between members to conflicts between the individual member’s interests and the union’s own interests.

Chapter 6 Section 2 of the Discrimination Act gives non-profit organisations whose statutes state that they are to protect their members' interests the right to bring actions in their own name as a party representing an individual. The organisation must have the consent of the individual and be suited to represent the individual, taking into account its activities and its interest in the matter, its financial ability to bring an action and other circumstances. This right is subsidiary to that of a trade union in the employment field. One important issue here is that due to the economic risks involved, such organisations usually file their cases as small claims cases. In small claims cases, the cost risks are minimal, but this also limits the amount of discrimination compensation that can be requested.

This provision on the ability of NGOs to act as parties was added to the law because of an interpretation of the minimum requirements of the EU anti-discrimination directives.²¹³ At the same time, prior to the change in the law, NGOs always had the possibility of providing assistance in the form of covering a victim's potential legal costs. However, for many years, this type of action was outside Sweden's legal and political culture, at least for NGOs that did not represent the stronger interests in society (such as unions or employers' organisations). There was no tradition of NGOs of maintaining their own legal expertise or establishing public interest law firms to provide that expertise. This is slowly changing.

Anti-discrimination bureaux in particular have been allowed to enter into cases as parties on behalf of claimants.²¹⁴ There have been some questions about the right of a bureau to represent claimants in court in accordance with the rules in the Discrimination Act. It now seems clear that they have such a right.²¹⁵ There is also an expectation that they will increasingly take cases to court.

The reduction in the number of complaints dealt with by the Equality Ombudsman due to a focus on 'strategic' complaints and means of dealing with discrimination other than through individual complaints, has led to increasing reliance by victims on the bureaux. This occurs especially since the Ombudsman often refers complainants to the bureaux as a potential source of advice and support.

The bureaux are thus increasingly looking at ways of taking cases to court. Among other things, they take part in the public debate, arrange seminars for the general public and provide anti-discrimination training for the private and public sectors. The inspiration for their work came from similar bureaux in the Netherlands and the UK, and more indirectly from public interest law firms in the United States.

In this regard, it may be noted that the 2016 Government white paper 2016:87, on measures to improve the implementation of the anti-discrimination principle, proposed a substantial increase in funding to the local anti-discrimination bureaux, given their increasing workloads.

Even beyond the work of the local anti-discrimination bureaux, civil society has been developing an increased awareness of the importance of being more proactive concerning the development of case law related to discrimination. The main LGBT organisation in Sweden, RFSL, has brought some cases in the administrative courts that involve discriminatory treatment (but not within the terms of the Discrimination Act), partly with the help of local anti-discrimination bureaux.²¹⁶ In addition, two disability organisations have received funding for projects to raise awareness of the law and to increase the potential for civil society to take cases to court.²¹⁷ One of these projects, the Law as a tool for social change, helped to develop an NGO that is now known as Disability Rights Defenders Sweden (DRDS). DRDS has been a driving force behind the cases concerning discrimination against pupils with dyslexia during national exams.²¹⁸ This is mentioned here since it is only in recent years that civil society organisations representing discriminated-against groups have seen the advocacy potential in taking on an enforcement role concerning the law.

Even if civil society is increasingly realising the need to get cases to court, they seldom have the economic resources that may be needed for effective representation. Thus, another idea that is developing involves the Fund for Discrimination Cases (Talerättsfonden),²¹⁹ which was established in 2017 by a number of equality and discrimination experts to raise funds and provide some expertise in strategic discrimination cases. The primary idea is the development of a healthy 'competition' or complement to the work done by the unions and the DO.

It bears repeating that one key issue about the identity of the named party is that, other than in small claims cases, they risk being ordered to pay the winning party's legal costs – which can be substantial.

This leads to the final alternative, which is private representation. According to Swedish procedural law, anyone can in theory engage in proceedings or support a complaint as a legal representative, in accordance with Chapter 12, Section 22 of the Swedish Code on Judicial Procedure (1942:740). The person is presented to the court and the court makes a formal decision whether to accept that person as a legal representative (rättegångsbiträde). If the person is law abiding and does not risk becoming involved in the proceedings as a witness or something similar, there is usually no problem. A legal representative (rättegångsbiträde) may speak on behalf of the claimant and the claimant is bound by what he or she says or does, unless the claimant immediately declares a different opinion. Nevertheless, most legal representatives have a law degree. They will often be members of the Swedish Bar Association (Advokatsamfundet), and the title of Advokat (lawyer) is reserved to members of the bar. Unlike in some countries, however, lawyers in Sweden, as members of the bar, do not have a monopoly on the right of representation in civil law cases. In this situation, the claimant risks becoming fully liable for their own legal costs as well as those of the opposing party if they lose the case.

b) Engaging in proceedings in support of victims of discrimination (joining existing proceedings)

In Sweden, unions and other organisations are not entitled to act in support of victims.

As stated in Section 6.2.a above, organisations can represent victims, but under Swedish procedural law they are not allowed to join or intervene in existing proceedings. Sweden does not have the equivalent of friend of the court or amicus curiae briefs.

c) Actio popularis

In Sweden, national law does not allow associations, organisations or trade unions to act in the public interest on their own behalf, without a specific victim to support or represent (actio popularis).

When an organisation goes to court in its own name in Sweden (see Section 6.2.a above), this must be done in order to represent a specific victim.

However, the Government recently set up an inquiry to investigate whether measures are needed to strengthen the protection against discrimination in cases where there is no individual injured party.²²⁰

d) Class action

There is a possibility under Swedish law – outside of labour law – to submit a class action (or group proceeding) to a district court for claims arising from the same issue.²²¹ Such cases are to be dealt with according to the rules on civil disputes. However, class actions are not allowed if the case can be appealed to, for example, the Labour Court. Thus, labour law cases fall outside the scope of the act, but discrimination in other fields can result in class actions.²²²

This means that a person can pursue a lawsuit on their own behalf, but with legal consequences for other persons, even though they are not parties to the case.²²³

There are various types of difficulties related to the use of class actions, which is probably why there have been so few since the law came into effect in 2003.

Nevertheless, there is one class action relevant to discrimination law. In this case, R brought a class action on behalf of 43 women who asserted that they had been passed over in favour of less qualified men in the admissions process at a university for veterinarians. The district court held that they had all been discriminated against and were each awarded damages²²⁴ of EUR 3 270 (SEK 35 000). The appeal court, in agreeing with the district court, concluded that the admissions system was disproportionate with regard to its goals, and that this constituted discrimination.²²⁵

This case shows that, under the right circumstances, it is possible to bring an action for discrimination in fields other than working life. Even though there are various questions and difficulties related to the use of class actions, they can have significant potential under the right circumstances. They also provide NGOs in particular with the potential to combine situation testing with a class action, for example in the case of inadequate accessibility.

However, important developments in the case need to be communicated by the court to all of the group members.

²²⁴ The case involved the laws prior to the 2009 Discrimination Act, which is why damages rather than discrimination compensation was awarded.

6.3 Burden of proof (Article 8 Directive 2000/43, Article 10 Directive 2000/78)

In Sweden, the Discrimination Act requires a shift of the burden of proof from the complainant to the respondent.

This is stated in Chapter 6, Section 3 of the Discrimination Act:

'If a person ... demonstrates circumstances that give reason to presume that he or she has been discriminated against ... the defendant is required to show that discrimination or reprisals have not occurred.'

This section applies to all six forms of discrimination including harassment and inadequate accessibility. The victim of discrimination must be able to present facts that make it possible to presume that discrimination has occurred (a similar situation and unfavourable treatment). Thereafter the burden of proof is shifted to the other party who must show that one of the requirements is not fulfilled or that the unfavourable treatment was not associated with the ground in question. No proof of intent to discriminate is required. At the same time there seems to be a different interpretation of the burden of proof in the general court system as opposed to the Labour Court.

In their commentary explaining the 2009 Discrimination Act, Fransson and Stüber point out a possible difference in the handling of the burden of proof.²²⁶ The Supreme Court treats the less favourable treatment in a similar situation as the fact that makes the presumption apply. The eased level of proof thus sometimes applies when the claimant proves a similar situation and the less favourable treatment.²²⁷ The Labour Court applies the presumption more narrowly. The claimant must always prove the similar situation and the less favourable treatment according to normal standards of proof. The presumption applies only to the causal link between these two facts and the discrimination ground. That being so, the Labour Court perhaps applies the rules on a shifted burden of proof in a manner that is too restrictive, especially with regard to ethnicity.²²⁸

The difference between the general courts and the Labour Court was also taken up in a Government white paper. The inquiry report stated that it seemed to be accepted by the Labour Court and the general courts that the rule now involves a presumption (presumptionsregel) and is not a shared burden of proof rule. At the same time, the report seemed to be asserting that the big difference was that the general courts used the rule, while the Labour Court tended not to. The inquiry thus appeared to conclude that an even clearer wording of the rule in the act would help.²²⁹ However, no change in the law has yet been proposed.

In 2017, the Labour Court dealt with a case that was quite similar to a case that had been dealt with in the general court system one year earlier. In both cases, the focus was on implementation of the burden of proof.

²²⁸ There are other possible explanations for the difference in the claimants' success rates. One possibility is that obvious cases of discrimination are often settled in the negotiations between the employer and the trade union at a local or central level. They must take place before going to the Labour Court if a trade union is representing one of its members. There is also an ongoing discussion, however, on whether judges appointed by trade unions and employer organisations are neutral, if important parts of the collective bargaining system are affected by the outcome. Also, see Sandesjö, H. (2010), p. 18.

These cases turned on whether there is an alternative to bare lower arms for a Muslim dental student (district court) or a Muslim dentist (Labour Court). The focus was on the application of health and safety regulations, the desire of those involved not to work with their lower arms exposed due to religious reasons and whether an application of this rule constituted indirect discrimination.

The 2016 district court case involved a female Muslim dental student at Karolinska Institutet.²³⁰ In accordance with the dental programme, she was required to perform clinical tasks with bare forearms. She asked if she could wear disposable forearm protection instead of having bare forearms, because she did not want to show this part of her body to strangers.

The institute, drawing on National Health and Welfare Board Regulation (2007:19),²³¹ made a formal decision denying this request. The state, in defending the content of the rules, said that simple rules such as having bare forearms were easier to follow in everyday situations than complex rules with alternatives, and that simplicity was important for rules that need to be followed every day and for every patient. It also said that, as the arms are harder to clean if they are covered, a disposable forearm protection could contaminate the person's work clothes when taken off, as well as increasing the amount of waste produced. The state had experts from the institute itself and from the Public Health Authority testifying that having bare arms was necessary to achieve the hygienic standards required by the regulation.

The Equality Ombudsman brought in a British expert describing the reasons why British authorities believe that there is no hygienic problem with disposable forearm protection.

The court decided that both the British expert's reason as to why disposable forearm protection was acceptable and the Swedish experts' statements on why there were genuine hygienic reasons against their use seemed scientific and credible, and that it was not possible to believe one more than the other. However, it was the education provider (as the alleged discriminator), who bore the burden of proof with regard to the justification of possible indirect discrimination once the prima facie case was established. The district court applied the rules of burden of proof in accordance with the established practice in the general courts. Therefore, the state lost the case. The state had legitimate concerns, but even the state's expert admitted that the British example showed that such disposable protection had been used in the UK, and no one had been able to demonstrate a relevant increase of infection risk there.

The woman was awarded EUR 468 (SEK 5 000) as a discrimination award. Normally, EUR 936 (SEK 10 000) is a minimum award (SEK 5 000 for the injury and SEK 5 000 as a prevention award). In this case, the injury was minimal (måttlig). The denial of the woman's demand was based on a serious evaluation of the situation and was addressed in a formal decision – it was not arbitrary. In the future, every Muslim will presumably be correctly treated by this education provider in such situations, so a prevention award was deemed unnecessary.

The state did not appeal the decision, thus accepting the district court's decision that the rule in the regulation was disproportionate.

The Karolinska case was followed by one in the Labour Court in 2017, in which the court came to the opposite conclusion, even though it was deciding a case based on essentially the same evidence.²³² The Labour Court case arose in an employment setting during the claimant's clinical work as a dentist. The hygiene standards were thus the same in both cases, as they stemmed from the same National Health and Welfare regulation.

The reasoning of the Labour Court was very similar to that of the district court up to the point when the employer presented the objective justification. Like the district court in the previous case, it considered that the experts on both sides were credible. The employer showed reasons why it was theoretically possible that there could be a hygiene problem. The expert for the Equality Ombudsman showed that it was not possible to detect increased infections in Britain connected to permitting the use of disposable lower arm protection.

The case was thus decided on the basis of how the rules on the burden of proof were to be applied. However, while the district court placed the burden of proof on the discriminator, because it is the discriminator who should be responsible for proving an objective justification, the Labour Court did the opposite. The Labour Court said that, when the employer presented the genuinely objective theoretical hygiene reasons, the burden of proof shifted back to the claimant. Since the Equality Ombudsman failed to disprove the assertions of the employer's expert, the Equality Ombudsman lost the case. The main argument for this outcome was that, when patient safety is at risk, the employer must be allowed a wide margin of appreciation when setting hygiene rules (försiktighetsprincipen – the duty-of-care principle) and thus any remaining doubt must fall on the claimant.

In this case, the Labour Court appeared to choose to add a footnote to the burden of proof rules – a footnote that is not easy to find in the directives, the Discrimination Act or the legislative preparatory works. The case illustrates the disparity between two court systems when they have a different approach to the EU rules on the burden of proof and where no one can demand that the Labour Court ask for a preliminary ruling from the CJEU, even when there is an obvious need for one.²³³ At the same time, the Swedish Supreme Court was reluctant to send questions to the CJEU in previous years. This in turn resulted in the so-called revolt of the lower courts, which ended up bypassing the Swedish Supreme Court by sending questions directly to the CJEU.²³⁴

These two cases are quite controversial. Many people are against any 'concessions' at all concerning Muslims, and thus applaud the Labour Court for its application on the rules of burden of proof.

Today, the Karolinska Institutet applies the ruling from the district court by allowing disposable lower-arm protection, while dental clinics do not need to do so with regard to employees.²³⁵ At some point or another, an education provider is likely to follow the practice of the Labour Court and, when that happens, the general court system will presumably have to decide whether or not to ask for a preliminary ruling from the CJEU.

²³³ If both Sweden and Britain take patient security seriously and still decide on different policies with regard to disposable lower arm protection, it is perfectly possible that the CJEU would have decided to allow the Member States a wide margin of appreciation and that the Labour Court would have been allowed to decide the case as it did. It is also possible, however, that the CJEU would have said that, if the claimant showed that an alternative solution had been applied in another country without any indications of increased infections, then any remaining uncertainty should fall on the employer, as they bore the burden of proof for the objective justification in an indirect discrimination case as a matter of principle. In the author's view, the latter reasoning seems to be the most rational. This was possibly a reason for the Labour Court not to send the issue to the CJEU – or at least they did not want to take that chance.

²³⁴ The key issue was that of ne bis idem (no one shall be tried twice for the same offence) in relation to EU law. The lower court's action led to a judgment in the Åkerberg Fransson case (Case C-617/10 Fransson [2013]), which forced the Supreme Court to change its recently established case law. This also led to the re-examination of a large number of cases. See, for example, Fast, K. (2013), 'Tusen skäl att förekomma istället för att förekommas – en kommentar till dubbelbestraffningsfallen i EU-domstolen och Högsta domstolen 2013' (A thousand reasons to act rather than being required to react – a commentary on the double jeopardy cases in the CJEU and the Swedish Supreme Court), Juridisk Tidskrift 2013-14 nr 1, pp. 24-44.

In the author's opinion, one of the difficulties for the Labour Court in applying the burden of proof may relate to certain broader legal and cultural factors concerning the court. The Labour Court was created mainly as a special arena where the unions and employers' organisations could settle disputes concerning rights and duties under collective bargaining agreements. They still appoint the majority of the judges. It is only in discrimination cases that the majority of judges are made up of the 'law' judges. The main original issue was – and still is – collective rights. At the same time, individual rights have increasingly become part of Swedish law, including labour law, particularly since Sweden joined the EU. To a large extent, discrimination law concerns individual rights, even if individual cases can be an important tool for exposing structural discrimination relating to the rights of groups that have been marginalised. For a long time, the social partners jointly opposed the adoption of such laws. This history forms part of the environment within which the Labour Court functions even today, i.e. the world of the social partners, rather than the world of the individual. The general courts perhaps find themselves a little closer to the idea of individual rights. This background provides at least some additional explanation of how two court systems can seemingly implement the same rule in very different ways.

6.4 Victimisation (Article 9 Directive 2000/43, Article 11 Directive 2000/78)

In Sweden, there are legal measures that provide protection against victimisation. Victimisation is prohibited in accordance with Chapter 2, Sections 18 and 19 of the Discrimination Act.

Victimisation (repressalier) is defined in the legislative preparatory works as acts, statements and omissions to act which lead to a disadvantage or a sense of discomfort for the individual.²³⁶

The prohibition protects all persons involved in an investigation, including witnesses and persons reporting discrimination or those who have helped the victim in other ways. According to Chapter 6, Section 3 of the Discrimination Act, the shifted burden of proof applies in victimisation cases.

6.5 Sanctions and remedies (Article 15 Directive 2000/43, Article 17 Directive 2000/78)

a) Applicable sanctions in cases of discrimination – in law and in practice

The basic sanction in the Discrimination Act is the discrimination compensation award, which is regulated in Chapter 5, Section 1. This is complemented by the possibility of declaring certain acts, such as the discriminatory termination of contracts or discriminatory contract clauses void (Chapter 5, Section 3). There are no other remedies under the act open to the individual who has been the target of discrimination.²³⁷

An important case affecting sanctions in Sweden was taken to the CJEU by the DO. According to Swedish procedural law, if the compensation requested is paid by the defendant, the complainant has no right to a judicial determination of discrimination. In the case of Diskrimineringsombudsmannen v Braathens Regional Aviation AB, the DO brought a lawsuit against the airline, asserting that it had discriminated on the basis of ethnicity when a man was removed from a plane, forced to undergo an extensive security check and subsequently denied the opportunity to re-board the plane. Without admitting discrimination, the airline paid the requested compensation of EUR 950 (SEK 10 000). Once such a payment is made, that generally ends the case. The DO appealed, wanting a hearing on the issue of discrimination, asserting that the complainant had a right to a hearing on the discrimination issue, and that that was the minimum required by the EU directives.

²³⁷ With regard to breaches of active duties, a court order involving a financial penalty can in theory be issued.

After an appeal, the Supreme Court agreed in 2018 to send the following question for a preliminary ruling:

'Must a Member State in a case of infringement of a prohibition laid down in Directive 2000/43/EC, where the victim requests discrimination compensation, always examine whether discrimination has occurred - and, where appropriate issue a finding of discrimination - whether or not the accused has or has not acknowledged that discrimination occurred, if this is requested by the victim, in order for the requirement in Article 15 on effective, proportionate and dissuasive sanctions to be considered fulfilled?'

The case was pending before the CJEU at the cut-off date for this report.²³⁸

The concept of discrimination compensation (diskrimineringsersättning) was created, at least in theory, in order to make it easier for the courts to provide higher amounts of compensation than was previously the case in relation to damages. Discrimination compensation awards are not supposed to be in line with the low general levels of civil damages in other legal areas. The award includes a right to compensation or damages for the violation caused by the discrimination. Chapter 5 Section 1 also requires the courts to give 'particular attention to the purpose of discouraging such infringements'. There is a preventive goal as well as a compensatory goal.

In working life there is also a basic right to economic damages concerning employees. However, in recruitment and promotion cases, the individual is not considered to have a right to obtain the employment or promotion in question.²³⁹ Economic injuries are thus not compensated. However, it is only the non-economic injury which is compensated. As is usually the case in Swedish labour law, if it is reasonable, damages can be reduced or removed completely. Depending on the discriminatory act, other labour law provisions may apply in parallel, such as the rules of the Employment Protection Act in cases of dismissal or those of the Co-Determination Act in cases where a collective agreement is violated.

The declaration of provisions in collective agreements and in individual contracts as invalid is possible in all areas of the law under Chapter 5, Section 3.

Injunctions have a very limited use in Sweden. Although the possibility exists, the author knows of no cases related to discrimination where an injunction has been issued.

Violations of the penal provision on unlawful discrimination can be punished by a fine or imprisonment for a period not exceeding one year and can result in an obligation to pay financial compensation in accordance with Chapter 16, Section 9 of the Penal Code. The maximum prison sentence for hate speech, as set out in Chapter 16, Section 8, is two years.

Sanctions are normally applied to, for example, an employer, university, labour union or employers' association. This follows from expressions such as 'employer' or 'university' in the provisions on financial compensation. Harassment by fellow workers or students may, however, also come under general criminal law provisions on such behaviour, e.g. as harassment, verbal abuse, threats or assault.

In such cases, a complaint may also result in sanctions against the individual directly responsible for the actions.

²³⁸ CJEU, Judgment of 15 April 2021, Diskrimineringsombudsmannen v Braathens Regional Aviation AB, C-30/19, EU:C:2021:269. This case was decided after the cut-off date for this report.

For sanctions under the Discrimination Act, no differentiation is made between the public sector and the private sector.²⁴⁰

In relation to the duty to undertake active measures, in theory, the Ombudsman works in the same way as a normal authority, visiting employers and universities, checking their equality documentation and so on. If somebody fails to fulfil their duties, the Board Against Discrimination²⁴¹ may – on the Ombudsman’s application – issue an order to comply with a specific request before a certain date (or in the future), subject to a financial penalty in accordance with Chapter 4, Section 5 of the Discrimination Act. The financial penalty will gain legal force only after a district court has ordered the payment. The legality of the order itself, as well as the reasonableness of the amount, can be decided upon by the district court. The unions can also do this under certain circumstances.

Finally, to the extent that there are quasi-judicial powers or aspects within the mandate of the Equality Ombudsman, they have been rarely exercised, at least in formal terms. One indication is that only two decisions have been issued by the Board against Discrimination since its creation in 2009.²⁴² One decision was initiated by a union and the other decision related to a request for an order under penalty of a fine originally filed by the previous Gender Equality Ombudsman prior to the creation of the DO in 2009. It is possible that the whole enforcement structure concerning active measures is weak and should be removed and replaced. At the same time, this would be easier to assert if the limits of the law were tested at least once or twice by the DO. It should be noted that only the DO and the unions have the power to do this.

b) Compensation – maximum and average amounts

Swedish law currently provides no ceiling on compensation in discrimination cases. Nevertheless, compensation levels are low. The record for the amount awarded was set in 2014 by Svea Court of Appeal in a child custody case. Having a child taken away from its parents was seen as the worst injury that could be suffered, and therefore the discrimination award was set at EUR 14 000 (SEK 150 000) for each of the parties involved (both parents and the child).²⁴³

There are no statistics on the average amount of compensation awarded to victims.

In 2012, the Equality Ombudsman pointed out that, although it was too early to make definitive conclusions, replacing the term ‘damages’ (skadestånd) with ‘discrimination compensation’ (diskrimineringsersättning) in 2009 had not thus far resulted in any significant (nåmnvärd) increase in the amounts awarded.²⁴⁴ In 2014, the Equality Ombudsman concluded that various judgments indicated that the compensation levels for less severe violations would in many cases be too low to have a dissuasive effect. This was considered by the DO to be a problem in relation to the EU requirement concerning dissuasive sanctions: ‘Ineffective sanctions actually means the anti-discrimination legislation will not live up to the goal of protecting those who most need it’.²⁴⁵ In its Annual

Report 2017, the DO highlighted the need for more effective sanctions concerning violations of the Discrimination Act.²⁴⁶

The need for more effective sanctions seems to be in line with the conclusions drawn by Professor Laura Carlson in her analysis of compensation paid in employment discrimination cases. According to her calculations, the amounts currently being awarded by the Labour Court, adjusting for inflation, are about 4.5 % higher than they were in 1980. She points out that this does not appear to reach the threshold of enhanced compensation as envisaged by the change in terminology that came with the Discrimination Act in 2009. She also points out that this modest increase in compensation should be compared with the 170 % increase in trial costs and fees since the 1980s. She concludes that the trends concerning compensation awarded and increasing legal costs and fees, combined with low success rates, 'create a significant deterrent for claimants bringing discrimination claims.'²⁴⁷

Some of the Labour Court discrimination awards are notable, such as 2010 No. 91²⁴⁸ EUR 7 000 (or approximately SEK 75 000) and 2011 No. 37²⁴⁹ (EUR 11 700 or SEK 125 000). In the former case, the Equality Ombudsman asked for EUR 28 100 (SEK 300 000); in the latter case the Ombudsman asked for EUR 37 440 (SEK 400 000) as a discrimination award and EUR 9 360 (SEK 100 000) for the violation of the Employment Protection Act. An amount of EUR 11 700 (approximately SEK 125 000) was awarded in a one-for-all compensation for the violation of both acts.

However, since the legislative preparatory works on which the Discrimination Act is based are vague regarding the expected new levels of compensation, there is a large amount of legal uncertainty. The Supreme Court helped clarify some of the uncertainty in two cases decided on the same day in 2014.²⁵⁰ In the Veolia case, a bus driver had problems closing the doors of the bus. Two immigrants were sitting together, and one of them had her knee close to the stop request button. The bus driver walked over to them and removed her knee from the vicinity of the button (in a non-discriminatory way according to the courts). He also said that they should return to 'Taliban country' and made a rude gesture. The discrimination award was set by the appeal court at EUR 1 870 (SEK 20 000) each.²⁵¹ The Supreme Court increased the amount to EUR 2 340 (SEK 25 000) on the basis that this violation was as severe as a violation through words without threats can be. The violation award was set at EUR 1 400 (SEK 15 000) each. Furthermore, EUR 1 870 (SEK 20 000) was to be added as a prevention award. Normally a prevention award is the same amount as the award for the violation.

If only one person had been discriminated against, that person would have received EUR 1 400 (SEK 15 000) plus the full prevention award (SEK 15 000 plus SEK 15 000). Since two persons were to share the prevention amount, the court set the amount at a total of EUR 1 870 (SEK 20 000), to be divided between the two persons involved, as the court concluded that EUR 2 800 (SEK 30 000) would have been too harsh for the perpetrator.

A.H., a 62-year-old woman, applied for a position as a job coach with the Public Employment Service. She was not called to an interview, and two women aged 27 and 36 were hired. A.H. was at least as qualified as one of the persons hired and was better qualified than the other. Thus, a presumption of age discrimination arose. She was also better qualified compared with a man who got an interview, and therefore a presumption of sex discrimination arose as well.

²⁵¹ In Sweden, the ground of ethnicity also covers race.

There are some situations where one may be able to identify a standard level of compensation, for instance in the case of a person not being allowed to eat at a restaurant, resulting in damages of EUR 1 400 (SEK 15 000) under normal circumstances. It is unclear what will happen to these levels. The author believes that violations concerning a restaurant or nightclub are probably less severe compared with the bus case. At the same time, some restaurants seem to encourage discrimination if for no other reason than that they think it will be more lucrative for them. Potentially, the prevention award should be much higher here compared with the bus case, where the employer presumably had a substantial interest in their bus driver behaving properly.

As to sanctions, Swedish law generally provides for low levels of compensation or damages. For example, a discrimination compensation award of even EUR 7 500 (SEK 80 000) will hardly deter a larger employer. For large employers or businesses, the threat of publicity is real and probably much more significant.²⁵² For small employers or small businesses, the sanctions are possibly a deterrent.

c) Assessment of the sanctions

An economic efficiency analysis of discrimination awards was commissioned by the Equality Ombudsman and undertaken by a professor of national economics.²⁵³ From an economic standpoint, there are clear deficiencies. Discrimination awards are divided into two parts. One portion is intended to compensate the victim for the violation of his or her integrity. The other portion – the prevention portion – is intended to dissuade the discriminator in relation to future violations. The most basic deficiency according to the report is that the prevention portions of discrimination awards seem to be too low to prevent future infringements. The report also states that from an econometric efficiency standpoint, the discrimination award would need to be extremely high on some occasions if the low detection risk in many areas is to be properly taken into account.

In the author's opinion, it should be obvious that it is highly doubtful that Sweden, due to its legal, social and political culture, will ever develop extremely large discrimination compensation awards. This issue was also discussed by the author of a report for the Equality Ombudsman.²⁵⁴ It should nevertheless also be obvious that larger awards are necessary if the law is to become more effective. Greater justification for this could come from understanding the substantial damage arising in various situations, as well as the damage caused to third parties, as was pointed out in the above-mentioned report. These issues have been missing from the discussion of the preventive potential of discrimination awards, just as, in the author's opinion, a serious discussion has been lacking concerning the sanctions and remedies system under the Discrimination Act, as well as other potential complementary issues such as anti-discrimination clauses in public contracts or other similar anti-discrimination measures related to the public sector.

In the author's opinion, the sanctions in respect of the labour market would be more effective if there was a right to damages for economic loss in cases of recruitment and promotions, at least in regard to the most qualified applicant. The most qualified applicant, if he or she can prove that discrimination occurred, would not have a right to the job, but the right to damages as if they had been hired and fired. This type of change would raise the cost risks associated with discrimination without radically changing the system of damages in Sweden.

²⁵³ Stenek, J. (2015), En samhällsekonomisk analys av diskrimineringsersättningen (A socioeconomic analysis of discrimination compensation), available from the Equality Ombudsman – document LED 2015/299 17.

Outside the labour market, the sharply reduced level of civil damages in cases where discrimination is proved by situation testing may violate the principle of effectiveness, according to the author, at least with regard to nightclubs.²⁵⁵ However, this situation may change if there is a greater focus on discouraging future infringements. The author finds that the Supreme Court case from 2014²⁵⁶ provides some positive reasoning concerning the preventive portion of the compensation, especially if a focus is placed on the importance of stopping what is thought to be economically profitable discriminatory behaviour by a club owner. This could lead to a higher prevention award as a part of the discrimination award. The Equality Ombudsman is of the opinion that the low level of awards made to persons suffering from discrimination with regard to access to goods and services is a real problem (SEK 20 000 or EUR 1 900 being a typical award).²⁵⁷

As to the overall question of whether the available sanctions are, or are likely to be, effective, proportionate and dissuasive, there are two basic issues. The first issue would arise if Sweden were to be found to be non-compliant with the directives regarding the sanctions available in Sweden. In the author's opinion this is unlikely, since Sweden can be considered as more effective than many other countries in this regard.

However, the more important issue is whether the current system for sanctions is sufficiently effective, proportionate and dissuasive to bring about the goals of the directives and thus the goals of the Discrimination Act. In the author's opinion, given the current state of the legislation and the case law, this is doubtful. The potential sanctions are not the only issue, but they are an important one.

As was pointed out in the 2005 inquiry into structural discrimination, the overall system for promoting equality and counteracting discrimination needs to concentrate on the idea that if discrimination costs, or carries with it, substantial cost risks, most people with the power to discriminate can refrain from their discriminatory tendencies. The key is not necessarily sanctions but convincing those with the power to discriminate to work seriously on preventing discrimination. The end goal is not compensation for victims, but rather that potential victims are not subjected to discrimination in the first place.²⁵⁸

Some changes in the law could and should be made, including in relation to economic damages relating to recruitment and promotion. At the same time, policymakers need to take a more holistic view, by examining other legal tools that can help to ensure the effectiveness of the principle of equality.

One idea is a review of the rules on class actions, so that they become more effective, especially in discrimination cases. This should also mean that class actions are available in labour law as well.

Concerning restaurant and nightclub discrimination, almost all such establishments have liquor service licences, granted by their local authority. These licences are a privilege, not a right. The licences could be tied, through the Alcohol Act, to the idea that the licence holder is put on notice that discrimination is a violation of the trust granted to them by the public, and that discrimination can lead to revocation of the licence.

There is an important additional sanction which, even though there seems to be little follow-up concerning implementation, has substantial potential as a complementary tool in relation to the Discrimination Act. Under the Regulation on anti-discrimination conditions in public contracts (2006:260), Sweden's largest national Government agencies must include an anti-discrimination condition in their larger public procurement building and service contracts. The purpose of the regulation is to increase awareness of and compliance with the Discrimination Act (2008:567).²⁵⁹

It is hard to say very much about the effects of this regulation or those used by some local authorities (e.g. Stockholm, Malmö and Botkyrka). The total value of all public sector contracts in Sweden is over EUR 56.1 billion (SEK 600 billion) annually.²⁶⁰ The national Government's contracts are valued at about EUR 18.7 billion (SEK 200 billion). There have been no evaluations or follow-up of the clauses used by the different agencies. Nevertheless, in the author's opinion, if the anti-discrimination conditions are formulated in such a manner that serious potential sanctions such as cancellation are included as a part of the contract, their preventive potential is substantial. There is currently little risk in violating the Discrimination Act, given the limited risks around detection, enforcement and economic sanctions. This applies particularly in relation to active measures. However, even if the detection risks are minimal, if a business risks losing, for instance, a contract worth EUR 4.7 million (SEK 50 million) due to a violation of the Discrimination Act, this probably means that the company has a much greater incentive to deal with active measures in a more serious manner than has been the case hitherto. This would also be an important factor concerning individual complaints.

In the author's opinion, these types of approaches to the issue of what policymakers can do concerning sanctions, i.e. focusing on the cost risks of discrimination, can help to ensure that sanctions actually become effective, proportionate and dissuasive.

7 BODIES FOR THE PROMOTION OF EQUAL TREATMENT (Article 13 Directive 2000/43)

- a) Body designated for the promotion of equal treatment irrespective of racial/ethnic origin according to Article 13 of the Racial Equality Directive

In Sweden, the specialised body designated for the promotion of equal treatment irrespective of racial/ethnic origin, in accordance with Article 13 of the Racial Equality Directive, is the Equality Ombudsman (DO). The DO has a broad anti-discrimination and equality promotion mandate established by law (the Equality Ombudsman Act). The grounds covered by the DO's mandate are sex, transgender identity or expression, ethnicity, religion and other belief, disability, sexual orientation, and age. The DO's scope of action includes, but is not limited to, working life, education, labour market policy activities and employment services, starting or running a business and professional recognition, membership of certain organisations, goods, services and housing, health and medical care and social services, national military service and civilian service and, to a limited extent, public sector employment.

The head of the DO is appointed by the Government. All responsibility for the agency lies with the head of the agency. There is no governing board.

- b) Political, economic and social context of the designated body

In 2009 and 2010, there was extensive public criticism of the Equality Ombudsman (DO). Much of this had its beginnings in a case taken to court concerning discrimination against a Muslim man. His labour market subsidy was withdrawn for failing to shake hands in an interview for an apprentice position with a potential employer who was a woman. The DO won the case in February 2010.²⁶¹ This resulted in massive and almost unanimous criticism of the DO in editorials. Feminists and politicians were especially critical. Few seemed to have read the actual judgment, and it was the DO that was criticised, but in general there was little criticism of the court. On top of the media criticism of the DO, there were also problems concerning the administrative management of the DO. In February 2011, the head of the office was removed. News reports at the time stated that the Government acted, among other things, due to a slowness of decision-making.²⁶²

Although it can be asserted that there is broad political support for the Equality Ombudsman, this seems to be dependent on the DO being relatively uncontroversial and unchallenging. It appears to the author of this report that victims of discrimination have had less and less trust in the DO, at least since 2011. The DO asserts that it has become more strategic. At the same time, according to a former Gender Equality Ombudsman, the DO has moved from trying to use the law to promote equality through taking on cases and assisting victims, to merely providing information concerning discrimination.²⁶³ Agreement with this criticism can be found among NGOs and various experts in the field.²⁶⁴

Also see in particular the criticism from the former Gender Equality Ombudsman, Lena Svenaeus in fn 281 and 290.

This development is taking place in an environment where, even though there has been increased funding for certain equality issues (including for the DO and the new Gender Equality Agency), the political debate is becoming increasingly focused on law and order issues – largely in response to fears of increasing support for Sweden’s far-right party. The elections in September 2018 led to an increase in the votes for that party, causing confusion about the results. After months of speculation, a minority Government, consisting of the Social Democrats and Greens, was finally formed in January 2019 with the support of two centre-right parties.

Sweden is taking steps towards the creation of a national human rights institute (NHRI). Although there is broad support for such a body in the Parliament, at least in theory, the support seems rather limited in that the Parliament rejected the idea of establishing the NHRI as a parliamentary agency. Instead, the Parliament sent the issue back to the Government. The issue of an NHRI has been on the table since at least 2010. In October 2018, a departmental inquiry recommended the establishment of the NHRI as a Government agency with greater independence than most Government agencies.²⁶⁵ There may potentially be some overlap with the work of the Equality Ombudsman, but this is not yet clear. In a press release from 21 September 2020 concerning the budget bill for 2021, the Government proposed the establishment of a Swedish institute for human rights.²⁶⁶

The income and expenses for the Equality Ombudsman were about EUR 9.6 million (SEK 103 million) for each year from 2014 to 2016. There have been no dramatic increases or reductions since the Equality Ombudsman was created in 2009. In 2019, the budget was about EUR 11.8 million (SEK 125 million). The budget proposal for 2020 was about EUR 12.5 million (SEK 127 million).²⁶⁷

In 2020, the Equality Ombudsman had about 104 employees. The work is essentially divided into two main areas called knowledge and oversight (including responding to individual cases). Almost 60 % of the budget is used for information and education. Among other things, this has involved the production of short films for the internet, reports, etc. About 40 % of the budget is used for oversight (including responding to individual cases). The bulk of this is apparently dedicated to the many individual and general oversight cases with some connection to the Discrimination Act – generally resulting in DO decisions that are not legally binding and cannot be appealed. This part of the budget also involved the three discrimination cases that were filed with the courts by the DO during 2020.²⁶⁸ Nevertheless, it is noteworthy that the new Equality Ombudsman (as of December 2020), Lars Arrhenius, emphasises in the introduction to the Annual Report 2020 that in ‘the coming years it is important that among other things there is an increase in the number of legal cases and guidance decisions.’²⁶⁹ This may indicate the potential for a greater emphasis on the oversight mandate of the DO and could be a way to deal with the criticism of the DO by both civil society organisations as well as researchers concerning the failure to implement the law and the focus on education and information.

A highly critical analysis of the DO’s oversight cases was produced by the Law as a tool for social change project run by the Independent Living Institute in 2018. The lawyer for the project requested copies of all of the DO’s oversight cases for January 2017 through February 2018 for analysis. Of the 96 files provided, 93 concerned oversight of active measures. His main conclusion was that weak oversight does not counteract discrimination.

The oversight focused on providing information about the law along with an expectation of voluntary compliance, with nothing about the consequences of failing to follow the law.²⁷⁰

In October 2020, Lena Svenaeus released a thorough examination of the DO entitled Ten Years with the Equality Ombudsman – A report on the Dismantling of the Protection Against Discrimination.²⁷¹ As the title indicates, the report is critical. This well-researched and documented report shines a light on the major drawbacks that have developed during the last 10 years. Svenaeus underlines the idea that the DO, instead of focusing on its primary task, which is the protection of individuals from discrimination, has directed the activities of the DO towards so-called preventive work through information, awareness-raising and decisions that are not legally binding – in other words, work that is known to be ineffective or at least where there is little research to show that it is effective. This has resulted in a clear deterioration of the protection against discrimination and reduced respect for the Discrimination Act. Among other things she points out the decrease in the cases filed by the DO during those 10 years to only three or four per year, as well as the shift in terminology where ‘complaints’ filed by individuals have been reduced to ‘tips and notifications of discrimination’ from the public.²⁷² This has occurred in a situation where the DO has more than 100 employees and an annual budget that has grown to more than EUR 12 million. Svenaeus is also critical of the Government for not providing greater guidance concerning the protection of equality rights and calls on the Government to establish an inquiry on clarifying the DO’s mandate and how it can best be fulfilled.

Beyond the DO, the unions presumably play an important role, but there is no overview of the discrimination cases they take on, so it is hard to know how they are dealing with them. At the same it is worth noting that some unions are also highly critical of the DO’s oversight concerning both individual complaints as well as active measures. They have gone so far as to suggest the establishment of a separate equality body for the labour market.²⁷³ The DO responded by asserting that the unions did not understand the law, the mandate of the DO or the limits placed on the DO as an administrative authority.²⁷⁴

Very few cases are brought by individual complainants – the cost risks related to losing are too high for most people, perhaps especially those who are most likely to be victims. Some of the cases taken on by the local anti-discrimination bureaux lead to settlements. If and when a bureau brings a case to court, it will generally be a small claims matter, which avoids the risk of being required to pay the winning party’s legal costs. The dyslexia cases have shown that despite being small claims cases, this approach can have strategic value. Win or lose, those cases seem to have brought more media and official attention to the issue than years of NGO lobbying.

In summary, the equality body exists in a political, economic and social context where it has a practical monopoly on the development of case law as well as dominance in other ways, and, given the small number of cases being taken to court, the strategic importance of the body is being increasingly questioned. In the opinion of the author, it is important to point out that if education and awareness raising were sufficient to deal with discrimination, the law itself would hardly be necessary. There is also the problem that if there is extremely little risk that the law will be implemented, there is little reason for those with the power to discriminate to take the law into account.

c) Institutional architecture

In Sweden, the designated body does not form part of a body with multiple mandates.

The mandate of the Equality Ombudsman (DO) extends to counteracting discrimination and promoting equality in relation to the grounds of sex, transgender identity or expression, ethnicity, religion or other belief, disability, sexual orientation and age. The DO's mandate is set out in the Equality Ombudsman Act (2008:568). The DO has the duties described in the Discrimination Act (2008:567) as well as the duty to promote equality in other respects.

The DO's mandate includes the right to represent claimants in the courts as well as the provision of advice and other support to those subjected to discrimination. In addition, the DO shall inform, educate, discuss and have other contacts with Government agencies, enterprises, individuals and organisations, follow international developments and have contacts with international organisations, follow research and development work, propose legislative amendments or other anti-discrimination measures to the Government, and initiate other appropriate measures. As a practical matter the DO divides its work into two fields – knowledge (education and information) and oversight (non-binding opinions and legal cases).²⁷⁵

The annual regulation letter,²⁷⁶ which requires the DO to report back to the Government regarding specific tasks, can have some effect on the agency's priorities.

The Equality Ombudsman does not have a mandate as a general human rights institution in that its mandate is limited to the fundamental human right of equality and non-discrimination.²⁷⁷ In theory, it cannot deal with an infringement of a human right that is totally unconnected to a discrimination ground. However, the Equality Ombudsman has a very broad mandate in relation to setting its priorities and how to work with those priorities. For example, with regard to the Sami people, their rights as an indigenous people are not a direct part of the Ombudsman's official mandate, but their rights are so interlinked with their ethnic background that the Ombudsman has at times put an emphasis on Sami-related issues.

d) Status of the designated body – general independence

i) Status of the body

The Equality Ombudsman (DO) is a Government authority and is thus a separate legal person.

²⁷⁵ Equality Ombudsman (2021), Annual Report 2020.

The DO is currently placed under the Government's Ministry of Employment, under the Minister for Gender Equality, with responsibility for anti-discrimination and anti-segregation. The DO is appointed by the Government. The person appointed as the DO is responsible for the actions of the agency (en enrådighetsmyndighet).

There is no governing body. Such a body would have made the Equality Ombudsman less independent. Neither the Government nor any other organisation has a formal influence on the DO's decision-making. Instead, there is an advisory board regulated under Section 5 of the Equality Ombudsman Regulation (2008:1401). This board is chaired by the Ombudsman and has up to 10 members appointed by the Ombudsman for a term of two years.²⁷⁸

The Equality Ombudsman receives its annual funding from the Government, based on a budget approved by the Parliament.

The Equality Ombudsman recruits and manages its own staff.

In Sweden, all governmental authorities are independent when deciding individual cases, in accordance with the Instrument of Government Chapter 12, Section 2. Neither the Government nor the Parliament is allowed to influence individual cases. Instructions, whether issued by the Government or the Parliament, must consist of general principles on how to act. This applies to staffing decisions as well. A general instruction may be given, for instance on trying to provide apprenticeships for newly arrived immigrants. However, the Government cannot, for example, instruct any authority to hire a particular individual.

ii) Independence of the body

The word 'independent' is not stipulated in the Equality Ombudsman Act, but the body is, in theory, independent. At least initially, based on the legislative materials and their references to the Paris Principles, certain special measures were taken to underline the DO's independence. In addition, Sweden has a long theoretical tradition of a wall of separation between the Government and all governmental authorities. The Instrument of Government Chapter 12, Section 2 (which is part of the Swedish Constitution) prohibits the Government (and all other public bodies and representatives including the Parliament) from interfering in any individual case of any governmental authority.

However, if the issue of actions in individual cases is disregarded, it is obvious that the Government can direct the actions of an independent Government authority in other ways. This can include removal of the head of the authority, as well as the use of a regulation letter or possibly changing the mandate if the authority was established by Government regulation. One of the reasons for establishing the Equality Ombudsman through the Equality Ombudsman Act was that a change in the law, and thus the DO's mandate, would require approval by Parliament. Several of the previous anti-discrimination ombudsmen were created on the basis of a Government regulation, not an act. The act thus added an extra measure of independence.

Normally, if a governmental authority is to have a supervisory board, the Government appoints the board. The rule laid down in Section 5 of the Equality Ombudsman Regulation (2008:1401) clearly states that the Equality Ombudsman selects their own advisory board. This is an example of the high degree of independence given to the Equality Ombudsman. Even this measure was adopted, at least in part, with reference to the Paris Principles.

²⁷⁸ This board first met on 09.02.2010. The main rule is that the number of members must not exceed 10. Originally the idea was to have a broad representation of NGOs representing groups who experience discrimination, academics, the social partners, Government agencies and others relevant to the work. According to the DO's Annual Report 2020 there were no members of the board as a new head of the DO was taking over in December 2020 (p. 82).

However, it should be noted that the Government can basically amend or revoke e.g. the Equality Ombudsman Regulation at any time.

The Equality Ombudsman has independence mainly based on the general and constitutionally protected tradition of independent authorities in Sweden, as well as being established by law. Initially, this independence was complemented by some special independence-enhancing measures. However, in practice, it should be pointed out that one of the major reasons why the Equality Ombudsman's application to the UN for status as a national human rights institution was rejected was the lack of independence demonstrated by the manner in which the Swedish Government was able to easily remove the head of the Equality Ombudsman in 2011.

Although the DO is established by law, and even though the legislative materials for that law refer, inter alia, to the Paris Principles, the removal of the agency head in 2011 and the increasingly detailed regulation letters clearly indicate that the DO is accountable and is held accountable in regard to the interests of the Government. In the author's view, the DO's independence can be questioned since this situation can naturally cause problems if the DO takes positions that are contrary to the Government's interests. It becomes easier, consciously or subconsciously, to take positions that are less controversial.

Instructions can be given by the Government to the Equality Ombudsman by regulation letter. So far, this has been used for specific requests, such as surveys on different topics or reporting on certain issues. When the Equality Ombudsman was created in 2009, there was an understanding that the Ombudsman would receive only a blank regulation letter. This was one way of indicating the particular independence of the Ombudsman, with reference, inter alia, to the Paris Principles. This would allow the DO to set its priorities on the basis of its legal mandate without any interference by the Government. This was adhered to through 2012. Since then, the regulation letters have included various reporting demands depending on the Government's particular interests.

The regulation letter has clearly become a means of influencing the work of the Equality Ombudsman. All Government authorities (including the Equality Ombudsman) report back to the Government on the basis of their regulation letter. Even though the regulation letter for the Equality Ombudsman possibly contains fewer detailed requests compared to those for other Government authorities, the requests necessarily affect the independence of the office.

e) Grounds covered by the designated body

The Equality Ombudsman covers seven grounds of discrimination: sex, sexual orientation, ethnicity, religion and belief, disability, age and transgender identity or expression. In addition, the DO, in accordance with the Parental Leave Act (1995:584) has the right to bring cases on behalf of individuals regarding the prohibition against unfavourable treatment related to parental leave.

The Swedish Discrimination Act is to a large extent built upon the idea that all seven grounds are equal. Therefore, none of its staff only deal with a single ground, and there is no specified budget for specific grounds. When a priority is decided on, for example the issue of harassment, it can often transcend the various grounds, or it can be only a part of a ground, for instance Islamophobia or Afrophobia. The priorities are not based on the grounds, but rather on a determination of which issues need an increased focus.

In Sweden, intersectional cases can be a problem. One benefit of the Equality Ombudsman's mandate concerning all grounds has been the increased understanding that many complaints can involve multiple grounds, even if the individual did not realise this in the beginning. If they had approached a single-ground authority, the other ground or grounds might have been missed.

There is an increasing lack of clarity about the attention given to any particular ground. There are short-term political issues directing attention to specific grounds, ranging from gender equality and active measures to gender mainstreaming (not equality mainstreaming) in Government agencies to sexual harassment, and others concerning LGBT issues, disability issues, anti-Roma issues, Islamophobia and Afrophobia. At the same time, there seems to be a shift away from using the law as a tool for change regardless of ground, to using the law as an informational tool. Most of the so-called oversight cases are not available on the DO's website, which makes it difficult to analyse the attention paid to the various grounds. However, the few lawsuits and court cases involving the DO are all reported on the website.

The level of attention given to the various grounds can also be described as unsatisfactory in that the NGOs related to these different grounds all seem to be dissatisfied with the work of the DO on 'their' ground, particularly concerning complaints. The author tends to agree with the NGOs in that the DO has pulled back from using complaints as a legal tool for challenging norms through enforcement efforts, but this does not seem to be aimed at favouring particular grounds, rather, all grounds are disfavoured, which is connected with the DO's focus on and belief in information and education as a tool for social change.

- f) Competences of the designated body – and their independent exercise
 - i) Independent assistance to victims

In addition to the duties described in the Discrimination Act, the broad mandate specified in the Equality Ombudsman Act states in Section 2 that the DO 'shall provide advice and other support so as to help enable anyone who has been subjected to discrimination to claim their rights.' As with the previous ombudsmen, along with the Discrimination Act (Chapter 6, Section 2), this also means the right to represent individuals, with their permission, in court. The key issue instead is when and where the DO chooses to provide assistance. One problem is that effective exercise of this power also depends on an understanding of discrimination as well as the trust of the targets/victims of discrimination, both individually and in general.

The powers are exercised independently. Once the decision has been made to take on a case, including the willingness to take it to court, one indication of independence is the willingness to take on some cases of a controversial nature, such as the handshake cases.

In the few cases that are actually taken to court, the DO seems to commit the personnel and other resources that are needed in order to be effective, and it appears that a high level of courtroom advocacy is provided.

As for the cases that are settled, the DO has a basic policy against settlements unless the opposing party admits to discrimination as part of the settlement. Although the thinking concerning an admission of wrongdoing is understandable, in the view of the author of this report, that approach is not as effective as it could be. One reason is that, given such an admission, the settlement will presumably focus on the compensation paid. This potentially limits the possibilities with regard to more far-reaching settlements. For example, if someone applies for a job with a large employer, a settlement including a different but similar job, some compensation, and possibly a requirement of equality training for the employer's upper-level management could be more attractive than a settlement including only an admission of wrongdoing and compensation, both for society and for the individual involved. This is particularly true if the individual is unemployed and is offered a job that fits their educational background and experience.

The Government inquiry tasked with investigating how more people can receive help in pursuing discrimination complaints recommended that the DO develop a broader policy on potentially adopting a more creative approach to settlements. The inquiry report stated that:

'The Equality Ombudsman's primary task, also in the future, should be to help the parties reach agreement. However, in our opinion the Equality Ombudsman should broaden its work involving consensual solutions and examine the possibility for parties to reach agreement in more cases.'²⁷⁹

It is interesting to note the inquiry's reference to the DO's expressed views on settlements:

'Due to the imbalance in the power relations between the DO and the party accused of discrimination, it is also problematical that the DO works towards a settlement in cases where the legal situation is unclear or there is a dispute on the issue of guilt.'²⁸⁰

Naturally, it is important to be concerned that this imbalance in power is not used improperly. However, in the view of the author of this report, it would be even more important for the DO to be concerned with the substantial imbalance of power between those who have the power to discriminate and the victims of discrimination. In the author's view, providing a counterweight to those with the power to discriminate was the primary reason for the development and establishment of equality bodies in the first place. Policymakers and civil society organisations recognised that, otherwise, little would change, regardless of what the law said. This is of particular relevance when civil laws are used by the state to contribute to substantive change; civil laws here have a twofold purpose: redress for the victims and social change so that there is less need for redress. When civil laws are used to contribute to social change, this means policymakers are hoping that individuals will carry the burden of enforcing the law in a manner that leads not only to short-term redress but also to long-term changes in social norms.

It is difficult to say much about the effectiveness of those cases that are investigated that lead to oversight decisions. The complaints that are to be investigated are those that the DO has in theory determined can have a great impact, can affect societal development and can promote equal rights and opportunities.²⁸¹ These investigations are said to be neutral up until the time that the DO expresses a willingness to take them to court. Some then lead to settlements, some to court cases and some to other measures. The inquiry nevertheless recommended that the DO look for alternative dispute resolution measures, even if going to court is not possible or is undesirable. The inquiry also recommended improvements to communications with the person submitting the complaint as well as with the person complained against. As one alternative, the inquiry recommended that the DO provide clearer motivations when it decides not to take particular cases to court.

According to the Government inquiry, only a small number of complaints are investigated: although it may vary from year to year, the percentage of complaints that are investigated is about 15-20 % – in other words, most complaints are not investigated.²⁸² Although the inquiry pointed out that it is not reasonable to require the DO to investigate all complaints, it recommended that more of them should be investigated.²⁸³ It is hard to conclude that the DO is being particularly effective with regard to complaints in cases where the decision to send a form letter in response is based solely on the complaint. It is certainly possible that a number of complaints may be rejected on the basis of the complaint itself, especially if the person reading the complaint has substantial experience in dealing with discrimination and discrimination law – but presumably the most skilled and experienced are not involved at this stage. It is also obvious that, if 80-85 % of complaints are rejected, some of them will involve cases that fit the categories that should have been given priority, even according to the DO's own standards.

One problem concerning effectiveness is the decreasing number of cases taken on by the Ombudsman that lead to settlements or a decision by the courts. Individuals who have a case run substantial economic risks if they go to court without the support of the DO (or their union). For a number of years, individual complainants seem to have found it increasingly hard to get their cases investigated by the DO, with even less chance of obtaining support in taking a case to court, particularly given the DO's stated focus on cases of so-called broader interest. Effectively protecting victims of discrimination was the focus of the Government inquiry discussed above, which recommended that the DO investigate more cases and pursue more settlements.²⁸⁴ As the proposals were merely recommendations, the DO basically rejected them by stating that 'the DO's public law mission concerning ensuring compliance with the Discrimination Act can hardly be combined with an oversight where the purpose is to investigate and put forward the civil law claims of private individuals.'²⁸⁵ In 2020, the DO completed the transformation of the term 'complaints' (anmälan) to 'tips and notifications of discrimination' (tips och klagomål). This is to make it clear that things that were previously categorised as complaints are now simply information for the Government agency. The change in terminology has two goals. One is to clarify that the DO takes in information from individuals concerning discrimination for the purpose of counteracting discrimination in society without this meaning that the DO will establish a case for investigation by the DO. The other goal is to increase the number of 'tips and notifications' concerning general tendencies that might lead to discrimination.²⁸⁶ The DO's website stresses that only a few 'tips' will be investigated and even fewer will be taken to court. In particular, the website emphasises that even if 'tips' are submitted to the DO, it is up to the individual to comply with the various limitation periods that can apply, if they eventually want to go to court.²⁸⁷ In other words, the DO has no responsibility in this regard.

In the author's opinion, given the statements above by the DO and the increasing focus on individual and general oversight cases where there seems to be little focus on the actual victim, there is a decreasing focus on the role of providing independent assistance to victims. This seems to take place only in those few cases that the DO is willing to take to court. It appears that there is a desire to avoid the complexity, confusion and emotions that are a natural part of providing assistance to individuals in discrimination cases. That is the job of a lawyer in such a situation – sifting out the relevant legal issues while still maintaining the confidence of the victim. It has perhaps gone so far that the positions taken by the DO (the difficulty for the DO in taking 'forward civil law claims of private individuals') and the actions taken by the DO (the rollback in the number of court cases and the transformation of the terminology of 'complaints' to the DO into 'tips and notifications of discrimination'), call into question whether Sweden is actually regressing in terms of the protection provided according to the directives.²⁸⁸

²⁸⁴ See Committee Directives 2014:10 and 2014:79 and especially White Paper SOU 2016:87, p. 33-34. As stated by the inquiry, "We do not believe it is reasonable to propose that the Equality Ombudsman investigate all the complaints it receives. However, we do believe that the Ombudsman should investigate more cases by notifying the reported party so that they learn of the complaint and are given the opportunity to respond to it. This may lead to the reported party revising their procedures or voluntarily offering some form of compensation to the victim. In addition, more parties will learn that they have been reported and awareness about discrimination can spread. More victims of discrimination can obtain redress."

ii) Independent surveys and reports

The Swedish Equality Ombudsman (DO) has the competence to carry out and publish independent surveys and reports. This is stated in the Equality Ombudsman Act.

A few reports will be produced during a typical year, although there may be anything between no reports and five reports published in any individual year. The reports are generally of a high quality, in that they are produced by professionals in the field (often external experts). Normally, these reports describe the facts, and they are not designed to advocate for changes in legal rules or bringing about actual change in behaviour.

One example of a brief report published in 2020 is 'Active measures as tools for civil society'. It is basically a presentation concerning the activities of certain NGOs concerning counteracting discrimination in working life. Other 2020 publications from the DO are Willingness, understanding and being able - An analysis of local government guidelines and routines regarding harassment, sexual harassment and retaliation, 'Statistics concerning complaints to the DO from 2015 – 2019' and Build, prevent and prioritize - An analysis of the construction industry's guidelines and routines for preventing harassment, sexual harassment and retaliation.²⁸⁹

In the author's opinion the effectiveness with which the DO exercises its competence to carry out reports and surveys is hard to assess, since it is hard to understand the strategy behind them. At best they seem to be informational tools that could just as well be produced by other authorities and mainstream information outlets. In that respect they can be considered to be less than effective since they are seldom intended to break new ground or provide tools that actually challenge discrimination. Presumably the point of independence in this regard is the ability to formulate challenging questions and explore difficult issues that others are unwilling to pursue.

iii) Recommendations

The Swedish Equality Ombudsman (DO) has the competence to issue independent recommendations on discrimination issues according to the Equality Ombudsman Act.

In the legislative process, the Equality Ombudsman gives its opinions on new legislation that is relevant to the equality field. The adoption of the 2016 restrictive asylum legislation (lagen 2016:752) and the Roma registration scandal²⁹⁰ are both examples of the Equality Ombudsman taking positions on issues that fall outside the Discrimination Act but that are still of relevance to the field of discrimination.

The collaboration between the School Inspectorate and the Equality Ombudsman on the guiding principles for schools regarding the wearing of headscarves and burkas/niqabs is ²⁹⁰ Several years ago, the police in southern Sweden established a register containing the names of thousands of Roma persons and their relations, including small children and deceased persons. The DO concluded it was possible that ethnic profiling was being used by the police in its work and that there was a risk of discriminatory actions that could violate Section 17, Chapter 2 of the Discrimination Act. The DO recommended that the police investigate the occurrence of ethnic profiling and if needed undertake the necessary actions. Available at: <https://www.do.se/lag-och-ratt/stallningstaganden/tillsyn-av-polismyndigheten/>.

another example of the Equality Ombudsman acting independently but together with another Government authority.

Presumably the Equality Ombudsman is regarded as an expert in its field when dealing with other Government authorities or commenting on proposed legislation.

Nevertheless, in the author's opinion, it is difficult to conclude that the Equality Ombudsman's independent recommendations are particularly effective as the recommendations are seldom challenging and generally lack the support of the targets or victims of discrimination as well as of other actors, such as the unions and academics.

iv) Other competences

Under Section 1 of the Equality Ombudsman Act (2008:568), in addition to the duties described in the Discrimination Act (2008:567), the DO shall work to counteract discrimination and promote equality concerning sex, transgender identity or expression, ethnicity, religion or other belief, disability, sexual orientation or age. Section 3 exemplifies the broad mandate by specifying that, within the DO's sphere of activities, the DO shall: inform, educate, discuss and have other contacts with Government agencies, enterprises, individuals and organisations; follow international developments and have contacts with international organisations; follow research and development work; propose legislative amendments or other anti-discrimination measures to the Government; and initiate other appropriate measures. This last phrase was put in to underline that the DO's broad and independent mandate is clearly not limited to the issues set out in the rest of Section 3. These are examples of, but not limits on, what the DO may choose to do to counteract discrimination and promote equality. Thus, in the author's opinion, the Ombudsman has substantial freedom within its budgetary constraints to determine other potential activities and duties that may be needed beyond those enumerated in the act. Exactly what those are or could be, will be unclear until the Ombudsman decides to actually test the limits of its mandate.

In the author's opinion, the developments of recent years indicate that the DO is itself shrinking its broad mandate rather than testing its limits.

For the past few years, according to the annual reports, increasingly larger portions of the budget are being dedicated to communication and awareness raising, promotion and support of good practice and policy advice. In the author's opinion, this is what is generally done in Sweden concerning social change, in the belief that investment in education and information will affect attitudes. However, Swedes generally have good attitudes, especially those with the power to discriminate. It is then relatively acceptable to dedicate substantial resources to information and awareness raising, thus creating the feeling of change and of something being done, while the status quo remains pretty much the same.

g) Legal standing of the designated body

In Sweden, the Equality Ombudsman (DO) has legal standing to bring discrimination complaints on behalf of identified victims, assuming they provide a power of attorney to the DO. The DO then becomes the party in the case, which means that the DO will be liable for the other party's legal costs if the case is lost.

Chapter 4 of the Discrimination Act sets out the tasks of the Equality Ombudsman under the act, and Section 2 refers to its right under Chapter 6, Section 2 to go to court on behalf of an individual who has suffered discrimination.

In Sweden, the DO does not have legal standing to bring discrimination complaints ex officio to court.

In Sweden, the DO does not have legal standing to intervene in legal cases concerning discrimination, for example, as an amicus curiae.

The DO does not have legal standing to bring discrimination complaints on behalf of non-identified victims to court. Some commentators assert that the limitation of the DO's mandate to identified victims is problematic, and that Swedish law is not in line with the first point of the operative part of the Firma Feryn case.²⁹¹ On the other hand, in the author's opinion the CJEU was quite clear in stating:

'Consequently, Article 7 of Directive 2000/43 does not preclude Member States from laying down, in their national legislation, the right for associations with a legitimate interest in ensuring compliance with that directive, or for the body or bodies designated pursuant to Article 13 thereof, to bring legal or administrative proceedings to enforce the obligations resulting therefrom without acting in the name of a specific complainant or in the absence of an identifiable complainant. It is, however, solely for the national court to assess whether national legislation allows such a possibility.'²⁹²

Although national legislation can allow for such a power, when the Court states that the directive does not preclude Member States from making such a provision, the Court did not say that the directive requires it. In 2020, a Government inquiry was tasked with investigating whether measures are needed to strengthen the protection against discrimination in cases where there is no individual injured party.²⁹³

h) Quasi-judicial competences

Generally speaking, the Swedish Equality Ombudsman is not a quasi-judicial institution. It is more of an equality promotion body that can, among other things, take cases to court. However, it does have some formal quasi-judicial aspects.

In certain situations, the Ombudsman may, under Chapter 4, Section 3 of the Discrimination Act, order the suspected discriminator to provide information, allow access to the workplace and enter into discussions. Such an order can be subject to a financial penalty.²⁹⁴ The financial penalty will gain legal force only after a district court has ordered the payment. The legality of the order itself, as well as the reasonableness of the amount, can only be decided upon by the district court. The Equality Ombudsman cannot impose other sanctions on the discriminator.

It is also possible that the DO is trying to develop a quasi-judicial competence, given its focus on individual and general oversight cases where the end result is essentially an opinion that is not legally binding and not subject to appeal. If such opinions gain acceptance by the parties involved, this could be considered a form of quasi-judicial competence – even if this is something that was not contemplated by the Swedish legislature.

At the same time, in the author's opinion, these types of non-binding, non-appealable decisions by the DO have little effect on those with the potential to discriminate. They will naturally pay attention in the short term and they will be civil, but their actions will hardly be affected as they come to realise that the DO is only making suggestions and recommendations and there is no risk that the DO will undertake any action in court or otherwise to enforce them. Naturally, they may realise that non-discrimination is in their own interest, but that will presumably not be due to the suggestions of the DO.

i) Registration by the body of complaints and decisions

The Equality Ombudsman registers the number of inquiries and complaints it receives (by ground, field, type of discrimination, etc). Today these are called tips and notifications of discrimination (see Section 7.f.i above, on independent assistance to victims). These data are available to the public and are presented in the annual report. The statistics for the previous year are made available around the end of February. Each annual report from 2009 onwards can be easily downloaded from the Equality Ombudsman's home page.

Due to a change in the manner that such information is registered, some of the figures for 2020 vary substantially in comparison to 2019.

According to the 2020 annual report, in 2020 the DO received 2 882 complaints, tips and notifications of discrimination (as compared with 2 166 in 2019, and 2 025 in 2018). The increase is attributed to the change in terminology (from complaints to tips and notifications) and the new online form that was made available on 1 September 2020.²⁹⁵

In 2020, the distribution was as follows: 1 146 concerned ethnicity, 916 disability, 676 sex, 497 age, 237 religion or other belief, 62 sexual orientation, 49 transgender identity or expression and 152 concerned sexual harassment.²⁹⁶ The distribution of the grounds of complaints has remained relatively stable over the years.

In 2020, the DO filed three lawsuits and three court decisions were issued in cases that the DO was involved in.²⁹⁷ This is relatively similar to 2019 when the DO filed five lawsuits and was involved in five court judgments.²⁹⁸ These figures can be compared with 16 initiations of court proceedings in 2015 and 25 in 2014.²⁹⁹

In 2020, 183 oversight decisions were made as compared to 2019 with 645 decisions and 650 in 2018. The decrease is among other things a result of the DO finishing up its oversight work in relation to the guidelines and processes implemented by local and regional government authorities.³⁰⁰

j) Roma and Travellers

Over the years there have been many cases involving Roma. However, in the Annual Report for 2020, the Roma are only mentioned indirectly in relation to the case that the DO lost concerning discrimination of a Roma family by employees of a toy store.³⁰¹ The Roma are not a specific priority. Nevertheless, it is likely that Roma are involved in the DO's priority areas related to housing and social services.

During 2020 the DO was involved in negotiating a settlement on behalf of two Roma women who were discriminated against due to their ethnicity by a ferry operator. The company admitted the discrimination and paid discrimination compensation of EUR 2 460 (SEK 25 000) each.³⁰²

8 IMPLEMENTATION ISSUES

8.1 Dissemination of information, dialogue with NGOs and between social partners

- a) Dissemination of information about legal protection against discrimination (Article 10 Directive 2000/43 and Article 12 Directive 2000/78)

The activities of the Equality Ombudsman involving reports, training programmes and dialogue with NGOs, the social partners and Government authorities, (as mentioned above in relation to the DO's Annual Report 2020), led to the reports described below.³⁰³

The report 'Active measures as tools for civil society' is basically a presentation on the activities of certain NGOs concerning counteracting discrimination in working life. It is the culmination of a 2019–2020 DO project focused on carrying out different activities that could contribute to strengthening civil society organisations' capacity to stimulate the work of employers with active measures in working life. Naturally a dialogue with a broad range of NGOs representing the various discrimination grounds was a necessary part of the project.

The 2020 publication, Willingness, understanding and being able - An analysis of local government guidelines and routines regarding harassment, sexual harassment and retaliation, is an extended analysis of the DO's examination of the guidelines and processes in place in local and regional government bodies around Sweden. This included communication with Sweden's 287 local government authorities. Local government authorities are not only important service providers, but are also often a major employer in the region.

The 2020 publication, Build, prevent and prioritize - An analysis of the construction industry's guidelines and routines for preventing harassment, sexual harassment and retaliation, is a result of a multi-year examination of the work carried out within the construction industry. This included discussions with the social partners.

- b) Measures to encourage dialogue with NGOs with a view to promoting the principle of equal treatment (Article 12 Directive 2000/43 and Article 14 Directive 2000/78)

In 2020, the Government tasked the Ombudsman for Children with developing a knowledge base concerning the exposure of children and young people to racism. The task is to be carried out in cooperation with the DO, the National Agency for Education, the Child and Student Ombud at the Schools Inspectorate and the Swedish Media Council. The Ombudsman's mission includes gaining knowledge of their experience from children and young people as well as from relevant organisations in civil society.³⁰⁴

The Government continues to provide subsidies to local anti-discrimination bureaux. They constitute a key element in providing assistance to victims of discrimination, in terms of advice, representation and awareness-raising. NGOs dealing with discrimination are encouraged to be members of and to form local anti-discrimination bureaux. Some bureaux, like the one in Malmö, seem to have become fairly important voices in counteracting discrimination in their regions, which gives them an interesting platform from which to engage in dialogue with others. In 2020, additional funding was provided to Malmö mot Diskriminering and Antidiskrimineringsbyrån Väst (in Gothenburg) for the purpose of strengthening the work against discrimination with a focus on children and young people.³⁰⁵

The National Board of Housing, Building and Planning has been tasked with analysing the risks of discrimination and other obstacles to accessing the housing market. The analysis should also examine the relationship of such obstacles to certain groups establishing themselves in the labour market. This is to be done in cooperation with the DO, the Delegation against Segregation and the Ombudsman for Children. In addition, such an analysis requires making contact with the relevant bodies such as landlords, tenants' associations, local government authorities and civil society organisations.³⁰⁶

- c) Measures to promote dialogue between social partners to give effect to the principle of equal treatment within workplace practices, codes of practice, workforce monitoring (Article 11 Directive 2000/43 and Article 13 Directive 2000/78)

The DO's work described above in paragraph a provides some examples of work in 2020 involving dialogue with the social partners. In 2020, the DO has also continued work on improving its 'Digital Guide to Active Measures', which was developed on the basis of cooperation and discussion with the social partners, including in relation to launching the updated version.³⁰⁷

- d) Addressing the situation of Roma and Travellers

Currently there is no specific body on the national level to address Roma issues. However, there are various actions taken in regard to Roma as well as their status as a national minority.

In 2019, a departmental inquiry proposed the establishment of a Government authority, to be called the Agency for Roma Issues (Myndigheten för romska frågor).³⁰⁸ It is to have responsibility at the national level for promoting work on the human rights of Roma, including providing support to the work on counteracting antiziganism.

The Roma are one of five national minorities in Sweden. The Stockholm County Administrative Board has been given special responsibility for all five national minorities. There is a continuing duty for the administrative board to continue its coordination and follow-up work in relation to the way in which Sweden's minority policy is implemented throughout the country.³⁰⁹ In 2020, the board released its report on Roma inclusion, which includes as a key issue the risk that the on-going work may be downgraded or stopped.³¹⁰

Furthermore, the Government is continuing to work on its national strategy for Roma inclusion covering the years 2012-2032. The goal is that, at the end of the period, the

In 2020, an inquiry entitled A Higher gear in minority policy - Strengthened coordination and follow-up turned over its investigation to the Government.³¹² Assuming that this inquiry contributes to more effective efforts concerning minority policy, the Roma should benefit as one of Sweden's five national minorities.

8.2 Measures to ensure compliance with the principle of equal treatment (Article 14 Directive 2000/43, Article 16 Directive 2000/78)

a) Compliance of national legislation (Articles 14(a) and 16(a))

The comprehensive Discrimination Act came into effect in 2009. Prior to that there were various laws against discrimination that had also been adopted to ensure compliance with the directives.

The task of proposing legislation in order to implement the directives into Swedish national law was given to a special investigator, who presented her report in the spring of 2002. Concerning Articles 14(a) and 16(a), the investigator pointed out that the inquiry did not find any laws or regulations that violated the prohibitions against discrimination in the directives. At the same time, the investigator pointed out that the inquiry's knowledge was incomplete concerning the potential existence of discriminatory regulations. This applied in particular to regulations of a lower status than those found in the Swedish Code of Statutes (SFS – Svensk författningssamling).³¹³

There have been no reports of laws, regulations or administrative provisions that are directly contrary to the principle of equal treatment in the directives. Furthermore, Chapter 2, Article 12 of the Constitution states that no act of law or other provision may imply the unfavourable treatment of anyone because they belong to a minority group due to their ethnic origin, colour, or other similar circumstances, or on account of sexual orientation. Article 13 provides a similar protection concerning gender. In addition, the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) was incorporated into national law in 1995 and given quasi-constitutional status. More particularly, Chapter 2, Article 19 of the Constitution states that no act of law or other provision may be adopted that contravenes Sweden's undertakings under the ECHR. This can be important since the ECHR contains an open list of discrimination grounds, thus complementing Articles 12 and 13.

The potential application of these articles was limited until the changes in the Constitution in 2010. Until 2010, these articles provided protection against discriminatory laws adopted by the Parliament only if the laws clearly violated the Constitution (uppenbarhetsrekvisitet). However, various amendments were adopted in 2010 that came into effect in 2011. Chapter 11, Article 14, concerning judicial review, now provides that if a court finds that a provision conflicts with a rule of fundamental law or other superior statute, the provision will not be applied. Furthermore, it is not only the courts but other public bodies administering justice that are to apply this standard of judicial review.³¹⁴ Therefore, even if discriminatory laws were somehow to get through the protections built into the legislative process, the Swedish Constitution provides the tools for setting aside such laws.

Thus, given the lack of reports on discriminatory laws and provisions, and the current state of judicial review, which provides the potential for not applying such laws, Sweden seems to have adopted the necessary measures to transpose and implement Articles 14(a) and 16(a).

b) Compliance of other rules/clauses (Articles 14(b) and 16(b))

The author does not know of any other rules/clauses that are directly contrary to the principle of equal treatment. Furthermore, the Discrimination Act transposes Article 14(b) and 16(b) respectively, since according to Chapter 5, Section 3 such rules/clauses in contracts, collective agreements, etc. that are contrary to the principle of equal treatment can be modified or declared invalid (null and void).

9 COORDINATION AT NATIONAL LEVEL

In 2020 Sweden continued to have a minority Government consisting of the Social Democrats and the Green Party, with the support of two centre-right parties.

Discrimination issues are included in the mandate of the Ministry of Employment and placed in the portfolio of Åsa Lindhagen, the Minister for Gender Equality, with responsibility for anti-discrimination and anti-segregation. She also has responsibility for democracy and human rights issues, the work against segregation, introduction of new arrivals and child rights. Several Government agencies including the Equality Ombudsman, the Discrimination Board, the Delegation against Segregation and the Gender Equality Agency are a part of this mandate.

In 2016, Sweden adopted a national plan to combat racism, similar forms of hostility and hate crime.³¹⁵ The plan provides a basis and a focus for the on-going work to combat racism and hate crime in the strategic areas identified by the Government: greater knowledge, education and research; improved coordination and monitoring; greater support for and more in-depth dialogue with civil society; strengthening preventive measures online; and a more active legal system. The plan sets out a structure for coordination and follow-up that lays the groundwork for long-term strategic work. Specific anti-racism measures that are undertaken over the years refer to various relevant parts of this plan.

10 CURRENT BEST PRACTICES

1. Civil society cooperation on strategic litigation concerning discrimination by schools and the National Agency for Education against children with dyslexia during national exams through the refusal to allow them to use the assistance devices they normally use in school. Raising awareness and empowerment through enforcement.

This best practice that was initiated in 2018 is on-going. Various NGOs joined together in 2018 to support strategic litigation on behalf of three pupils against local authorities that are responsible for schools as well as a claim against the National Agency for Education concerning discrimination against pupils with dyslexia.

National tests are set annually in schools around the country. Throughout the school year, children with dyslexia are allowed to use assistance devices to help them read. Instead of reading with their eyes, the devices help them to read with their ears. However, when taking the national tests, they are not allowed to use the devices. The schools, run by local authorities, assert that they are following the guidelines issued by the National Agency for Education. The agency set the guidelines for the national tests, including the requirement concerning the removal of assistance devices from pupils with dyslexia during such tests.

In brief, two cases were lost at the district court level in 2019 and one was successful. In 2020 the cases were appealed to separate courts of appeal where each case was lost. Leave to appeal to the Supreme Court was denied (see the description of the cases in Section 12.2). The NGOs also supported the filing of a lawsuit in 2020 against the National Agency for Education as the agency's guidelines did not allow for the reasonable accommodations needed by these pupils. The NGOs are also considering assisting one of the pupils in sending an individual communication to the UN CRPD Committee due to Sweden's failure to live up to the requirements of the CRPD concerning reasonable accommodation. Presumably, thousands of pupils are affected annually by the issue.

The Dyslexia Association has pointed out the problem for many years. Disability Rights Defenders (an NGO formerly known as Law as a tool for social change), Talerättsfonden (a discrimination litigation fund) and the Dyslexia Association cooperated in finding pupils and supporting their cases. Although the lawsuits against the schools and local government bodies were unsuccessful in the end, they generated substantial publicity concerning the issue, both locally and nationally.³¹⁶ The case against the National Education Authority has not yet gone to trial. Furthermore, assuming a communication is submitted to and accepted by the UN CRPD Committee, an authoritative decision as to reasonable accommodation in these cases can be expected.

The dyslexia cases are a practical example of how civil society can cooperate in relation to enforcement, potentially even providing a healthy 'competition' or complement to the Equality Ombudsman and the unions. In the long run, the author expects that this type of action will help to transform law in theory into law in action.

2. Ten years with the Equality Ombudsman – A report on the dismantling of the protection against discrimination, written by Lena Svenaeus, a researcher in law and sociology and Gender Equality Ombudsman 1994-2000.³¹⁷

This report provides a clear and concise analysis by the author of the dismantling of the protection against discrimination over a 10-year period. Although it would be hard to find someone with the author's unique combination of practical hands-on experience and theoretical research expertise, this type of report would be useful in most countries. Svenaeus documents the shift from working on cases enforcing the law, thus helping individuals enforce their rights as well as contributing to changes in broader social norms, which seems to be the purpose of using civil law as a tool for social change. There has been a shift in focus to dealing with non-discrimination as if it is primarily a problem of a lack of knowledge, which can be resolved through enlightenment in the form of reports, short internet films, educational materials and non-binding opinions from an equality body that seems to lack an interest in enforcing the law. This shift also means dealing less with the victims of discrimination, which can be difficult and time-consuming, and dealing more with those who have the power to discriminate and who are more 'polished', making communication less challenging. It is more comfortable communicating with people such as other civil servants, employers and unions, than with distraught, upset and confused victims of discrimination. However, the nature of the work of an equality body seems to be determining how to make life uncomfortable for those who discriminate. Basically, Svenaeus is pointing out that the focus has to be on enforcement in individual cases as well as active measures. These will in turn stimulate the need of those with the power to discriminate to understand and actually implement the educational materials, reports, etc., that are produced.

A new Equality Ombudsman has been appointed. Hopefully he and other policymakers will be taking on board the contents of the report. He will have a chance to determine the direction of the Office of the Equality Ombudsman. Other policymakers need to be asking themselves if they want to have an equality body that has a focus on real change. If so, Svenaeus has various suggestions about the need for policymakers to clarify the work, direction and purpose of the Equality Ombudsman.

3. Programme for the rule of law in Sweden 2019. In 2020, the Swedish section of the International Commission of Jurists, after two years of consultations with lawyers, civil servants, academics and NGOs produced this legal reform programme. It has five chapters, three of which are relevant to equality. One deals with access to justice, another with the EU and the ECHR, and the third focuses on equality/non-discrimination.³¹⁸

The purpose was to establish a document to which various parts of society, particularly civil society, could go to for guidance on important legal issues where Sweden has problems and is in need of reforms. The point of the broad consultation was in part to collect information on problems and potential solutions, and in part to spread the ownership of the final programme. This was a way to establish greater legitimacy in terms of advocacy concerning the various issues. Where there are a variety of organisations behind the programme, policymakers tend to become more receptive to advocacy efforts.

For the sake of transparency, it should be pointed out that the author of this report was also involved in developing the ICJ's programme.

The chapter on discrimination describes various issues related to ethnicity, religion, sex, disability, sexual orientation and age. It also provides ideas for reforms that are common to all grounds, such as increased discrimination compensation, anti-discrimination clauses in public contracts and a fund for test cases run by civil society organisations, as well as some more ground-specific reforms.

4. Government support provided to local anti-discrimination bureaux. This is on-going best practice that has become increasingly important as the DO has decreased its work on individual complaints, including taking fewer cases to court.

In 2020, about EUR 2.75 million (SEK 28 million) was divided between 18 local anti-discrimination bureaux around Sweden. They not only provide advice and assistance at the local level to victims, but they are also increasingly taking on cases that can go to court. As their offices are local, there is greater potential to actually meet a lawyer or expert in contrast to the situation at the DO, which has its office in Stockholm. They can also provide training and awareness raising at the local level. As they are local NGOs, presumably they can also develop greater knowledge of the circumstances faced by victims. This means that they can also provide expertise to and for local organisations in relation to equality issues that can come up in a city council or a regional council. Even these bodies can undertake local initiatives to counteract discrimination or contribute to discrimination. See for example the administrative law cases described in Section 12.2.

5. Civil society engagement in international enforcement. Civil society provided support for the submitting of an individual communication to the UN Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities due to a failure to properly apply reasonable accommodation.

This is another situation in which civil society organisations can help to empower individuals in their cases, while at the same time supporting an international focus on defining Swedish law. In this case, the individual received a positive result, and the decision should help to clarify not only the Swedish understanding of reasonable accommodation, but also understanding of the laws of other jurisdictions that have ratified the CRPD.

The Swedish Equality Ombudsman (DO) filed a lawsuit on behalf of RS in 2017 against Södertörn University. He had applied for a job as a lecturer, a position that was withdrawn as the university determined that the accommodations needed would constitute an undue burden. The DO and the university limited the issues essentially to whether the amount of interpretation needed was unreasonable for a public employer with a staffing budget of appr. EUR 49.1 million (SEK 500 million). The Labour Court held that it was an undue burden, and thus there was no discrimination (Labour Court 2017 No. 51, Equality Ombudsman v Södertörn University).

In 2018, RS, with the assistance of Disability Rights Defenders Sweden, the Swedish Association of the Deaf and the Swedish Youth Association of the Deaf, submitted a communication to the UN Committee with Sweden as the State party. The focus was on an improper application of reasonable accommodation as required by the CRPD and a failure to ensure access to the labour market for deaf people through a lack of support for sign language interpretation.

The Committee concludes its analysis with the following:

'8.11 In the light of the above, the Committee considers that the decisions and interventions of the authorities of the State party limited the possibility for persons with disabilities of being selected for positions requiring the adaptation of the working environment to their needs. In particular, it considers that the Labour Court's assessment of the requested support and adaptation measure upheld the denial of reasonable accommodation, resulting in a de facto discriminatory exclusion of the author from the position for which he applied, in violation of his rights under articles 5 and 27 of the Convention.’ (pp. 15-16)

Referring to a previous case, the Committee points out that ‘the process of seeking reasonable accommodation should be cooperative and interactive and aim to strike the best possible balance between the needs of the employee and the employer. In determining which reasonable accommodation measures to adopt, the State party must ensure that the public authorities identify the effective adjustments that can be made to enable the employee to carry out his or her key duties.’ (p. 15).

While the Committee does not determine what should have been done, its focus was on the lack of a dialogue concerning the potential accommodations, and that reasonableness is also related to that dialogue. The Committee’s decision was issued on 8 August 2020.³¹⁹

11 SENSITIVE OR CONTROVERSIAL ISSUES

11.1 Potential breaches of the directives at the national level

In general, Sweden fulfils the requirements set by the directives. However, in the opinion of the author, the following points are problematic:

- Compared with the general court system, the Labour Court seems to apply the rules on burden of proof more restrictively towards the claimant. The 2017 dentist case is the first essentially similar case that has been tried in both systems and clearly demonstrates this difference. The Labour Court's practice does not seem to be in compliance with the directives, while the practice of the civil courts seems to be compliant. This may be one of the reasons why it seems harder to win cases of ethnic discrimination in the Labour Court (see Section 6.3 as well as Article 8 Directive 2000/43 and Article 10 Directive 2000/78).
- Discrimination against legal persons is not prohibited in working life (see Section 3.1.2 and Recital 16, Directive 2000/43).
- The principle of vicarious liability in relation to discrimination law is restricted when employees in theory act outside their authority to an extent that is problematic. Furthermore, the legal concept of 'employer' may be too narrow, as the employer is regarded as the legal person itself or the natural person who, as a representative of this legal person, makes decisions regarding the employees. The employer is thus directly responsible only when an employee discriminates against another employee and the latter is subordinate to or dependent upon the former. This type of limitation brings up the question of whether the directive has been transposed in the correct manner (see Sections 3.1.2.b and 3.2.1, and Articles 7 and 15 Directive 2000/43 and Articles 9 and 17 Directive 2000/78).
- In cases concerning recruitment, including promotion cases, there is no right to economic compensation (see Section 6.5.a and Article 15 Directive 2000/43 and Article 17 Directive 2000/78). If there was a right to economic damages, at least for the most qualified applicant, they would clearly contribute to the effectiveness and dissuasiveness of the sanctions and still be proportional.
- The Equality Ombudsman currently has a case before the CJEU. The Ombudsman was not satisfied with the general Swedish procedural rule that would allow an opposing party in a civil case to pay the amount sued for without admitting liability for discrimination or getting an authoritative judgment establishing discrimination. The Supreme Court, after an appeal by the Ombudsman, issued a decision requesting a preliminary ruling from the CJEU. The question submitted was:

'Must a Member State in a case of infringement of a prohibition laid down in Directive 2000/43/EC, where the victim requests discrimination compensation, always examine whether discrimination has occurred - and, where appropriate issue a finding of discrimination - whether or not the accused has or has not acknowledged that discrimination occurred, if this is requested by the victim, in order for the requirement in Article 15 on effective, proportionate and dissuasive sanctions to be considered fulfilled?'

This case will be decided by the CJEU in 2021.³²⁰ If the CJEU agrees with the DO, the results could have far-reaching effects for both Swedish law and EU law, not just in respect of equality law but in various other fields as well (see Articles 7, 8 and 15 of Directive 2000/43 and Article 47 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union).

³²⁰ CJEU, Judgment of 15 April 2021, Diskrimineringsombudsmannen v Braathens Regional Aviation AB, C-30/19, EU:C:2021:269. For more information see the DO's website at: <http://www.do.se/lag-och-ratt/diskrimineringsarenden/flygbolaget-bra/>.

11.2 Other issues of concern

The formal independence of the Equality Ombudsman (DO) itself is not a great concern. However, independence becomes a concern when the work of the DO shifts to a simplified focus on information about the law as the primary tool for social change, rather than actual implementation and development of the law as a tool for social change. This shift in focus undermines not only the DO, but also anti-discrimination work being carried out by others.

As a practical matter, this is connected in turn with the lack of case law, which in part is due to the enforcement strategies of the DO and the unions, the relative lack of power of civil society organisations representing discriminated persons and groups, and the barriers in access to justice related to the cost risks of taking discrimination cases to court. Without a critical mass of cases as well as more substantive case law, achieving the goal of the directives as well as the Discrimination Act becomes doubtful.

In the author's opinion, an equality body necessarily needs to be willing to fairly regularly challenge those with power in society, not just in court but in other forums as well. This applies to employers, business owners, unions, civil servants, researchers, politicians and others. Challenging those with the power to discriminate, and to prevent discrimination, creates an uncomfortable situation for civil servants working for the DO or in other Government capacities. This is especially true in a country that has an international reputation as a champion of human rights.

Basically, all of the key elements of Swedish discrimination law have been inspired by or transplanted from the EU or other jurisdictions. This applies to a civil law ban on discrimination, the establishment of an equality body, a shifted burden of proof, indirect discrimination, sexual harassment and active measures.

However, in the author's opinion, moving from law in books to law in action requires an understanding of the current legal and political environment, as well as the direction in which it needs to go. This means understanding that case law must be developed, even on behalf of less powerful interests. This is something of a disruptive change as regards the Swedish model, where collective thinking and a consensus culture has reigned, and in which individual rights have not always been at the forefront.

This is why the following are key concerns and/or needs:

- The lack of case law in regard to the Discrimination Act and related fields.
- The DO needs to investigate more complaints, more effectively. This is needed to build up the trust of victims and groups representing victims as well as the knowledge of DO staff concerning discrimination. Even from a strategic litigation viewpoint, development of this knowledge and trust is key.
- The slow development of public interest law firms that serve victims of discrimination.
- Amendment of the Discrimination Act in a way that can lead to larger and more substantive awards, e.g. economic damages for the most qualified job applicant.
- The use of anti-discrimination conditions in public contracts should be followed up and strengthened.
- The need for injunctive relief, for example, in the form of forward-looking orders on reporting back to the courts on the implementation of active measures should be investigated.
- NGOs other than unions should have a right, subsidiary to the DO's actions, to follow up the implementation of active measures.
- The cost risks placed on victims of discrimination who take cases to court on their own need to be reduced or removed entirely.

- A test case fund should be established, based at least initially on public funding, controlled mainly by NGOs, which can provide support to potentially strategic cases. Inspiration could be gained from Canada's Court Challenges programme.³²¹
- Concerning the prevention portion of discrimination awards, the law could be amended in order to provide economic support to the test case fund. For example, if 75 % of the preventive portion is to be paid into the fund, the courts might be more easily convinced that they should make larger awards related to prevention. The author believes that one hindrance to more dissuasive awards is the fear that the courts seem to have of unjust enrichment of discrimination victims.³²² This type of approach could help to remove that obstacle.

Even from a middle-class perspective, going to court is something few would contemplate. It should thus be clear that many discrimination victims cannot afford to assert their rights. For an employer or a business that discriminates, the risk of ending up in court is minimal. Even if they end up in court, discrimination awards are limited, and both the awards and the legal fees are generally business expenses. For the victims of discrimination, the risk can be their entire savings, if they have any.

One alternative is to support the anti-discrimination bureaux so that they can take more cases to court, at least in terms of strategic litigation and legal activism. To the extent that there are other role models in Sweden, Civil Rights Defenders and the Centre for Justice can be mentioned.

Swedish NGOs are becoming more active concerning enforcement. In a 2019 article, Disability Rights Defenders (formerly the Law as a tool for social change), a fairly new NGO, explained that it was formed to help ensure that more discrimination cases are tested, even in the courts. Having rights under the Discrimination Act does not mean much without a focus on access to justice. The NGO pointed out that they had helped to file six lawsuits in 2018, essentially without any funding, primarily through the use of volunteers. This could be compared to the four lawsuits filed in 2018 by the DO. The article ended by reaching out to the private legal profession concerning the need for more pro bono work on discrimination cases in Sweden.³²³

Artificial intelligence (AI), and its potential discriminatory results is increasingly being discussed and examined in Sweden by a variety of stakeholders. The focus is on the potential for fairer recruitment processes combined with the risk of discrimination through the use of AI in recruitment. One example is a 2020 master's thesis entitled 'Is AI the Key to Equal Recruitment? - A qualitative study on how artificial intelligence affects discrimination and prejudice during the recruitment process.'³²⁴ The authors conclude that AI can help to reduce the risk of discrimination in the recruitment process. However, this ³²² See the Supreme Court NJA 2008 p. 915. The case involved four young men who filed discrimination complaints with the DO. They used situation testing at a nightclub to establish ethnic discrimination. The DO won the case in the trial court and appeal court. The result was the same in the Supreme Court except that the damages awarded were reduced from a 'normal' amount of EUR 1 370 (SEK 15 000) to EUR 460 (SEK 5 000). The reduction was due to the use of situation testing which indicated that the victims were less injured since they expected the discrimination to occur. The underlying theme seemed to be the idea of unfair enrichment. Available at: <https://lagen.nu/dom/nja/2008s915>.

presupposes the development of unbiased AI-technology. Among others the DO has emphasised the potential risks related to discrimination when algorithms become part of activities such as a recruitment process.³²⁵ Another example is funded research to examine the increasing use of AI for decision making in the public sector, for example, by the tax authorities or the national insurance agency. Here the question is ensuring not just non-discrimination but also correct decision making.³²⁶ In any case, it is clear that AI is increasingly discussed in various circles. Nevertheless, hopefully those working with the issue will not lose sight of the fact that concerning discrimination, AI builds in the prejudices that already exist at the human level. The Government's interest in the field thus far can be seen in the document National Approach to Artificial Intelligence.³²⁷ The idea here is to determine future priorities concerning AI, particularly the potential in the development of AI. Sustainable AI also means avoiding various risks such as discrimination in the development process.

Name of the court: Labour Court

Name of the parties: Unionen v Stockholms läns landsting

Reference number: Case 3/2020

Link: <http://www.arbetsdomstolen.se/upload/pdf/2020/3-20.pdf>

Brief summary: A deaf person applied for a temporary, eight-month position as a receptionist. The want ad indicated that applicants should master all telephone techniques, including voice telephony. The person was not called to an interview and did not get the position since he could not use voice telephones. The court determined that this did not constitute direct or indirect discrimination or discrimination through inadequate accessibility as the use of voice telephones was a key component of the job. Unionen, the claimant's union, was ordered to reimburse the legal costs of the defendant, Stockholms läns landsting, in the amount of EUR 19 772 (SEK 201 000).

Link: <http://www.arbetsdomstolen.se/upload/pdf/2020/9-20.pdf>

Brief summary: Did an employer, through its denial of a doctor's request on three occasions to carry outside jobs, subject an employee to direct discrimination related to disability (her asthma) as well as a violation of the collective agreement's provision on side jobs? The case was an appeal from a district court decision in which the claimant lost the case and was ordered to pay the defendant's legal costs in the amount of EUR 25 572 (SEK 260 000). Although the Labour Court determined that the claimant's chronic asthma was a disability within the meaning of the Discrimination Act as well as CJEU case law, it was determined that the disability was not the cause of the actions in this case, thus there was no direct discrimination. The claimant however did establish a violation of the collective agreement resulting in an award of EUR 2 458 (SEK 25 000). Concerning legal fees, the claimant was required to pay the defendant a reduced amount of EUR 15 340 (SEK 156 000) relating to the district court trial and EUR 7 560 (SEK 76 875) for the Labour Court trial. The fee reduction was due to the fact that the claimant was partially successful in that she was able to establish a violation of the collective agreement.

Name of the parties: Fackförbundet ST (ST Union on behalf of J.L.) v Staten genom Arbetsgivarverket (State through the Swedish Agency for Government Employers)

Link: <http://www.arbetsdomstolen.se/upload/pdf/2020/13-20.pdf>

Brief summary: When terminating a probationary employment for an operator with the main task of writing down reports submitted by telephone, the police department applied a language requirement. The operator, JL, has a disability in the form of dyslexia. The State admitted that the Police Authority subjected JL to discrimination in the form of inadequate accessibility. The dispute in the case involves whether the Police Authority in connection with the termination of the probationary employment also subjected JL, by applying a language requirement, to indirect discrimination as well as how much in discrimination compensation the State must pay JL due to the Police Authority's discrimination in the form of lack of accessibility. Economic damages (loss of income) in addition to discrimination compensation is a possibility concerning indirect discrimination but not concerning inadequate accessibility. JL is disadvantaged by the language requirement so the issue becomes whether the level of the requirement is appropriate and necessary to achieve the legitimate purpose of the requirement. Given the circumstances concerning the inadequate accessibility, the Court awarded JL EUR 7 363 (SEK 75 000) in discrimination compensation. At the same time, the Court, after holding that the language requirement was justified, which meant that there was no indirect discrimination, determined that the State was successful concerning much of the case, leading the Court to require the union to compensate the State for 80 % of the State's legal costs. The union was thus ordered to pay the State EUR 13 844 (SEK 140 682) in legal costs.

Link: <http://www.arbetsdomstolen.se/upload/pdf/2020/58-20.pdf>

Brief summary: The issue was whether there was a justifiable basis for dismissing a court clerk due to lack of performance and cooperation problems that were linked to a disability in the form of autism. The case was an appeal from a district court decision in which TH was unsuccessful and was ordered to pay the State EUR 12 588 (SEK 128 210) for its legal costs. The Labour Court largely agreed with the district court's judgment concerning the failure to live up to the minimum work performance requirements that can be applied to a court clerk, the serious problems related to cooperation and that the employer had not been able to deal with these problems through reasonable accommodation measures. Thus, the Labour Court determined that TH, as the losing party should pay not only the State's legal costs in the district court but also in the Labour Court, in the amount of EUR 8 269 (SEK 84 250).

DISTRICT AND APPEAL COURTS

Relevant discrimination ground(s): Disability

Name of the court: Västmanlands District Court

Date of decision: 2020-03-03

Name of the parties: Equality Ombudsman (DO) v Svealandstrafiken AB

Reference number: Case T 2124-19

Address of the webpage:

<https://www.do.se/globalassets/diskrimineringsarenen/tingsratt/dom-tingsratten-vastmanland-t-2124-19-dom-2020-03-03>

Brief summary: Several times AA was not allowed on the buses run by Svealandstrafiken AB. The bus drivers had determined that AA's wheelchair together with AA's weight was more than 300 kg. For safety reasons, 300 kg is considered to be the maximum weight. The DO asserted, among other things, that the failure to adequately educate bus drivers as to the weights of various wheelchairs constituted discrimination in the form of inadequate accessibility. The district court held that the bus company had not subjected AA to discrimination on the four occasions when he was not allowed to ride the bus. The court determined that the company had done what was reasonable in order to ensure that AA could ride the bus. The fact that he was denied this opportunity on four occasions due to failures in judgment did not mean that he had been disadvantaged concerning accessibility. The DO thus lost the case and was also ordered to pay Svealandstrafiken's legal costs of EUR 9 054 (SEK 92 000).

Name of the parties: SL v Huddinge Municipality
Reference number: FT 8377-19
Address of the webpage: N/A

Brief summary: This was an appeal from a district court judgment. SL had asserted that she was subjected to indirect discrimination and discrimination due to inadequate accessibility when she was not allowed to use her assistance devices during a national test administered by her school. These are the devices that she normally uses in school to deal with her dyslexia. They allow her to read with her ears instead of her eyes. Swedish schools give national tests to students in the third and sixth grades. The guidelines for the national tests are issued by the National School Agency. They allow for only certain types of accommodations, such as a longer time period. The district court held that while SL was disadvantaged through adherence to the guidelines, the measures were shown by Malmö to be appropriate and necessary. Furthermore, the accommodations provided were sufficient. Thus there was no violation of the Discrimination Act. The appeal court upheld the decision of the district court. The Supreme Court did not grant a leave to appeal.

Relevant discrimination ground(s): Ethnicity
Name of the court: Göta Appeal Court
Date of decision: 2020-03-16
Name of the parties: Sagoland toy store v Equality Ombudsman (DO)
Reference number: T 1110-19
Address of the webpage: <https://www.do.se/globalassets/diskrimineringsarenden/hovratt/hovrattsdom-leksaksbutik.pdf>

Brief summary: In the district court it was determined that the toy store personnel closely followed a family around the store and threatened to call in a security company. The DO concluded that this disadvantaged the family, and that the behaviour was linked to the Roma ethnicity of the family. The court held that the toy store's actions constituted discrimination that has a connection to ethnicity. The store was required to pay a total of EUR 7 377 (SEK 75 000) in discrimination compensation to the two adults and one child. The store was also required to pay EUR 2 625 (SEK 26 690) in legal costs to the DO.

As compared to the district court, the appeal court determined that the evidence was lacking that the family was treated worse than anyone else would have been treated in a comparable situation. The facts were also lacking concerning the connection of the behaviour of the store's staff in relation to the family's ethnicity or that the behaviour violated the family's dignity under the circumstances. The district court's judgment was reversed. The DO was also required to pay the defendant's legal costs in the district court EUR 12 272 (SEK 124 780) and the appeal court EUR 3 063 (SEK 31 144).

Address of the webpage: N/A

Brief summary: Malmö appealed a district court judgment. The court held that the person represented by MMD had been subjected to discrimination in the form of inadequate accessibility. This was based on, among other things, a delay of at least a year in putting the acceptable support measures into place, which meant that the pupil did not have access to the education that they had a right to. Malmö was ordered to pay EUR 1 967 (SEK 20 000) in discrimination compensation. The appeal court upheld the judgment of the district court. The Supreme Court did not grant a leave to appeal.

Date of decision: 2020-08-24
Name of the parties: Örebro Municipality v HD
Reference number: FT 3960-19
Address of the webpage: N/A

Brief summary: This was an appeal from a district court decision holding that HD had been subjected to indirect discrimination and discrimination in the form of inadequate accessibility when a school run by the local government authority gave a national test to HD. Swedish schools give national tests to students in the third and sixth grades. As he wanted to use the accessibility devices that he normally uses due to his dyslexia, the results were not to count in relation to HD's grades. The failure to allow the use of the assistance devices normally used by HD – a reasonable accommodation – in a test that would count toward his grade constituted indirect discrimination as well as inadequate accessibility. This type of accommodation was not allowed due to guidelines set by the National Agency for Education. HD pointed out that the devices allowed him to read with his ears instead of his eyes. The court pointed out that the Discrimination Act should have been given priority over the guidelines issued by the National School Agency. HD was awarded EUR 982 (SEK 10 000) by the district court and legal costs of EUR 258 (SEK 2 625). The amount of legal costs that can be awarded in small claims cases is very limited.

The decision was appealed by Örebro Municipality. The appeal court reversed the district court judgment, concluding that Örebro's actions did not involve any discrimination under the Discrimination Act and that those actions did not constitute a violation of HD's rights under the European Convention on Human Rights or any other laws. HD was also ordered to pay Örebro's legal costs. The Supreme Court did not grant a leave to appeal.

ADMINISTRATIVE COURTS

Relevant discrimination ground(s): Religion
Name of the court: Malmö Administrative Court
Date of decision: 2020-09-11
Name of the parties: Citizen appeal v Bromölla Municipality
Reference number: Case 7680-19
Address of the webpage: N/A

Brief summary: Bromölla city council decided on 28 May 2019 to establish a 'Guideline regarding work and religion', applicable to employees that have the city as an employer.

According to the decision, the guideline would state that 'prayer time during paid working hours is not permitted'.

According to a special procedure in the Local Government Act, local citizens can appeal city council decisions to the administrative court for an examination of their legality. In other words, they could ask whether the city had the power to make the decision. The courts do not examine the appropriateness of such decisions. The decision here was appealed by a citizen who asserted that the decision was illegal, e.g., as a violation of freedom of religion, as well as a violation of the Discrimination Act.

The administrative court determined that the decision would constitute a general ban on prayer during working hours. There is no room for an individualised decision. Although it is possible to limit the manifestation of religion by a state, through law, under certain circumstances, the court noted that there was no such Swedish law that gave city councils the right to generally restrict the freedom of religion. Given that the council decision was contrary to the provisions on freedom of religion in the Swedish Constitution and the European Convention on Human Rights, and that there was no law granting such powers to Bromölla, the court annulled the decision.

Did the city council decision violate the Discrimination Act? The court concluded that the sections in the act concerning direct and indirect discrimination, based on their wording, are applicable to concrete situations where an individual is disadvantaged in the manner described. Against that background, the court determined that it was insufficient to merely assert that the decision violated the Discrimination Act. Therefore, the court held that the decision could not be annulled on that basis.

Name of the court: Malmö Administrative Court

Date of decision: 2020-11-17

Name of the parties: Citizen appeal v Skurups Municipality

Reference number: Case 113-20

Address of the webpage: N/A

Brief summary: Skurup's city council approved a bill on 16 December 2019 that was to be included in the city's integration plan, stating:

- headscarves, burqas, niqabs and other clothing that have the purpose of hiding students and staff shall not be allowed in Skurup's preschools, and
- headscarves, burqas, niqabs and other clothing that have the purpose of hiding students and staff shall not be allowed in Skurup's primary schools.

The bill points out, given the risks with large immigration from countries that do not share Sweden's views on gender equality, the need to emphasise that Swedish values apply in Sweden and that the wrong signals are sent when clothes are allowed that cover up or hide women and girls.

According to a special procedure (see above in Citizen appeal v Bromölla Municipality) the decision here was appealed by a citizen who asserted that the decision was illegal, e.g., as a violation of freedom of religion, as well as a violation of the Discrimination Act.

The court determined that the decision is formulated as a ban on the wearing of clothes for religious reasons in school. The court noted that national law does not contain a ban on the wearing of religious clothing and that normally clothing is something decided by each individual. In fact, the right to wear religious clothing and other religious symbols is protected by both the Swedish constitution and the European Convention on Human Rights. There is a possibility to prohibit, in certain situations, various types of attire, if they, for example, significantly complicate the interaction between teachers and pupils or entail special risks during work in a laboratory.

The city council decision at issue here establishes a general ban that constitutes a limitation of the constitutional freedom of religion. This type of limitation would require support in national law. There is no such support in Swedish law. Neither the Education Act nor any other law gives this power to a local government authority. Thus, the conclusion available is that the decision violates the freedom of religion in the constitution as well as the European Convention on Human Rights. Given this conclusion, the court annulled the decision.

Given this result, the court stated that it did not need to examine whether the city council decision also violated the Discrimination Act.

Relevant discrimination ground(s): Religion

Name of the court: Malmö Administrative Court

Date of decision: 2020-11-17

Name of the parties: Citizen appeal v Staffanstorps Municipality

Reference number: Case 6754-19

Address of the webpage: N/A

Brief summary: As a part of its integration plan, Staffanstorp's city council adopted the following: 'The municipality will not accommodate requests for, e.g., separate bathing times for men and women or gender-segregated education and will not accept headscarves for children in preschool and elementary school up to sixth grade'.

According to a special procedure (see above in Citizen appeal v Bromölla Municipality) the decision here was appealed by a citizen who asserted that the decision was illegal, e.g., as a violation of freedom of religion, as well as a violation of the Discrimination Act.

The court held that the decision is a general ban on pupils wearing a headscarf up to year six and will thus include people who want to manifest their religion in that manner. Thereafter the court determined that such a ban violated the right to freedom of religion as stated in the constitution as well as in the European Convention on Human Rights. As there was no Swedish law that gave city councils the right to issue such a general ban, the decision was annulled. Given this judgment, the court determined that there was no reason to examine the issue of a violation of the Discrimination Act.
