Symposium

Tools, Trades, and Technologies - Exploring Prehistory through Archaeolinguistics

With the symposium Tools, Trades, and Technologies – Exploring Prehistory through Archaeolinguistics, we aim to facilitate interdisciplinary dialogue, providing a deeper understanding of prehistory through the lens of archaeolinguistics. Topics range from wealth acquisition and trade emergence in early Indo-European societies to Tocharian agricultural tools, and Anatolian writing terminology. By intertwining linguistic and archaeological evidence, we seek to learn more about the Indo-European speakers and their material culture.
